ral science in almost every department, and the clear and happy style in which he presents his views, render his Physiology one of the most reliable and attractive works in our language. To the practitioner and general reader, we can heartily recommend it as an excellent résumé of the present state of physiological science. As a text-book for the student, we think it has no superior in our language, and for this object we presume it was chiefly, if not expressly written.—Med. Examiner, Oct., 1856.

have been spared to make the work a complete expression of the science of the day." This statement our own examination of the work enables us to confirm; every page of it testifying to the author's industry in culling from various quarters and sources all that was valuable in the physiological contributions to science of the last few years. The careful and scrutinizing spirit exhibited by the writer when investigating mooted questions, the extensive information he possesses

GENERAL THERAPEUTICS AND MATERIA MEDICA.

ADAPTED FOR A MEDICAL TEXT-BOOK.

WITH ABOUT TWO HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS.

SIXTH EDITION, REVISED AND IMPROVED.

In two very handsome octavo volumes, of about 1100 pages; leather, price $6.

The most complete and satisfactory exponent of the existing state of Therapeutical Science, within the moderate limits of a text-book, of any hitherto published. What gives the work a superior value, in our judgment, is the happy blending of Therapeutics and Materia Medica, as they are or ought to be taught in all our Medical schools; going no further into the nature and commercial history of drugs than is indispensable for the medical student. This gives to the treatise a clinical and practical character, calculated to benefit, in the highest degree, both students and practitioners. We shall adopt it as a text-book for our classes, while pursuing this branch of medicine, and shall be happy to learn that it has been adopted as such in all of our medical institutions.—The N. Y. Journal of Medicine.

III. (JUST ISSUED.)

NEW REMEDIES:

WITH FORMULÆ FOR THEIR PREPARATION AND ADMINISTRATION.

Seventh Edition, with extensive Additions.

In one very large octavo volume, of 770 pages; leather, $3.75.

It may be considered almost a work of supererogation to enter into an elaborate criticism of a work which has reached its seventh edition. The public has pronounced, in the most authoritative manner, its verdict, and we are certainly not disposed in the present instance to dispute its decision. In truth, such books as this will always be favorably received by the Profession of our country. They are labor-saving productions, which, at the expense of much research and reading to the author, condense in a convenient space the novelties and discoveries of the age. The present edition of this work is considerably enlarged and improved. The author, with his accustomed accuracy, has elaborated and amplified many of the articles but casually or imperfectly treated of in the former editions; and he has also added considerably to the list of new remedies. About thirty new agents, or novel applications of old remedies, are introduced to the notice of the reader in this edition.—Va. Med. and Surg. Jour., Sept., 1856.

IV.

THE PRACTICE OF MEDICINE.

A TREATISE ON SPECIAL PATHOLOGY AND THERAPEUTICS.

THIRD AND REVISED EDITION.

In two large octavo volumes, of about 1500 pages; leather, $6.25.

The student of medicine will find in these two elegant volumes a mine of facts, a gathering of precepts and advice from the world of experience, that will nerve him with courage, and faithfully direct him in his efforts to relieve the physical sufferings of the race.—Boston Med. and Surg. Jour.

PREFACE.

On this new edition of his "Medical Lexicon," the author has bestowed more than usual labour. It is not more than four years since a friendly reviewer, in one of the most learned of European medical periodicals, (the "British and Foreign Medico-Chirurgical Review" for July, 1853, p. 205,) in noticing a former edition, remarked, that the labour which had been bestowed upon the work had "been something prodigious;" adding — "the work, however, has been now done, and we are happy in the thought, that no human being will have again to undertake the same gigantic task. Revised and corrected from time to time, Dr. Dunglison's 'Medical Lexicon' will last for centuries."

Yet, in the present edition, not only has the work been "revised and corrected," but about six thousand subjects and terms have been added, which are not to be found in the one noticed by the "British and Foreign." Many of these have been introduced into medical terminology in consequence of the progress of the science; whilst others had escaped the author in the previous editions. These additions have necessarily required a great amount of labour, which—as on every former occasion of the kind—has been cheerfully bestowed, in order that the work might be rendered still more worthy of the vast favour which it has experienced. It has ever been the anxious desire of the author to make it a satisfactory and desirable—if not indispensable—lexicon, in which the student may search without disappointment for every term that has been legitimated in the nomenclature of the science; and the present very carefully revised, greatly enlarged, and accurately printed edition cannot fail to be more extensively useful, and to offer stronger claims to the attention of the practitioner and student, than any of its predecessors.

The author is grateful for the opportunity again afforded him of expressing his acknowledgments for the reception which the Dictionary has met with everywhere from the profession.

PREFACE

TO THE SECOND EDITION.

THE present undertaking was suggested by the frequent complaints, made by the author's pupils, that they were unable to meet with information on numerous topics of professional inquiry,—especially of recent introduction,—in the medical dictionaries accessible to them.

It may, indeed, be correctly affirmed, that we have no dictionary of medical subjects and terms which can be looked upon as adapted to the state of the science. In proof of this, the author need but remark, that he has found occasion to add several thousand medical terms, which are not to be met with in the only medical lexicon at this time in circulation in the country.

The present edition will be found to contain many hundred more terms than the first, and to have experienced numerous additions and modifications.

The author's object has not been to make the work a mere lexicon or dictionary of terms, but to afford, under each, a condensed view of its various medical relations, and thus to render the work an epitome of the existing condition of medical science. In its preparation, he has freely availed himself of the English, French, and German works of the same nature, and has endeavored to add every subject and term of recent introduction, which has fallen under his notice; yet, with all his care, it will doubtless be found that subjects have been omitted. The numerous additions, however, which he has made, and his strong desire to be useful, "by removing rubbish and clearing obstructions from the paths through which learning and genius press forward to conquest and glory," will, he trusts, extenuate these and other objections that might be urged against the work; especially when the toil, which every compiler of a dictionary must endure, is taken into consideration; a toil which has been so forcibly depicted by the great English Lexicographer, as well as by the distinguished SCALIGER:

> "Si quelqu'un a commis quelque crime odieux,
> S'il a tué son père, ou blasphémé les Dieux,
> Qu'il fasse un Lexicon: s'il est supplice au monde
> Qui le punisse mieux, je veux que l'on me tonde."

EXPLANATION.

If the simple synonymy of any term be needed, a mere reference to the term may be sufficient; but if farther information be desired, it may be obtained under the term referred to. For example, the French word Tronc is said to be synonymous with Trunk. This may be sufficient for the inquirer: should it not, the requisite information may be found by turning to Trunk.

This aberration in the human eye is corrected by the iris, which does not permit the rays to fall near the circumference of the lens, and also by the crystalline lens itself, which, owing to its structure, serves the purposes of an achromatic glass.

ABERRATION, SPHERICAL. Aberration of sphericity.

ABERRATION OF SPHERIC''ITY or spher'ical aberra'tion takes place, when the rays, as in a common lens, which pass through the centre of the lens, and those which pass near the circumference, are unequally refracted, so that they do not meet at a common focus.

ABSORP'TION, Absorp'tio, Resorp'tio, Inhala'tio, Imbibit'io, Anar'rhophē, Anarrophe'sis, Catapino'sis, Rhoëbde'sis, Catarrhophe'sis, Catar'rhophē; same etymon. The function of absorbent vessels, by virtue of which they take up substances from without or within the body. Two great divisions have been made of this function. 1. External absorption, or the absorption of composition, which obtains, from without the organs, the materials intended for their composition; and, 2. Internal absorption, or the absorption of decomposition, which takes up from the organs the materials that have to be replaced by the exhalants.

By external absorption is meant not only that which takes place at the external surface of the body, but also that of the mucous membranes of the digestive and respiratory passages. Hence, again, the division of external absorption into cutaneous—resorp'tio cuta'nea seu cutis, inhala'tio cutis,—intestinal or digestive, and pulmonary or respiratory.

Internal absorption is also subdivided into, 1. Molecular or interstitial, nutritive, organic, or decomposing, which takes up from each organ the materials that constitute it, so that the decomposition is always in equilibrio with the deposition. 2. The absorption of recrementitial secreted fluids, such as the fluid of serous membranes, synovia, &c. As these are constantly exhaled on surfaces which have no external outlet, they would augment indefinitely, if absorption did not remove them in the same proportion as that in which they are deposited. 3. The absorption of a part of the excrementitial fluids, as they pass over the excretory passages.

Absorption does not effect the decomposition of the body immediately. It merely prepares the fluid which has to be eliminated by the secretory organs.

The great agents of external absorption are the veins and chyliferous vessels; of internal absorption, probably the lymphatics. In the chyliferous vessels and lymphatics the fluid is always found to possess the same general properties. In them, therefore, an action of elaboration or selection must have taken place. The veins, on the other hand, seem to exert no selection. Any fluid, possessing the necessary tenuity, passes through the coats of the vessel readily by imbibition, and proceeds along with the torrent of the circulation. Watery fluids in this manner enter the blood when they are taken into the stomach. Substances that require digestion, on the other hand, must pass through the chyliferous vessels and thoracic duct.

Air also contains a small portion of carbonic acid gas, and has always floating in it aqueous vapour, different terrestrial emanations, etc. Its effects upon the human body vary according to its greater or less density, temperature, moisture, etc.; hence, change of air is found extremely serviceable in the prevention and cure of certain morbid conditions. AL'CHYMY, Al'chemy, Alchemi'a, Alchimi'a, Adep'ta Philosoph'ia, from al, an Arabic particle, signifying, 'superiority, excellence,' and Chimia, 'Chymistry.' This word was formerly synonymous with Chymistry; but, from the 7th century, it has been applied to the mysterious art of endeavouring to discover a universal remedy, and a mode of transmuting the baser metals into gold: an operation to which they gave the name Opus magnum, and Philosopher's stone.

Alchymy has also been called Scien'tia vel Philosoph'ia Hermet'ica, from an idea that Hermes or Mercury was its inventor.

Harris has well defined this chimerical art: 'Ars sine arte, cujus principium est mentiri, medium laborare, et finis mendicare.'

AL'CHYMIST, (Old Eng.) Alkymistre, Flatua'rius, Adept'. One pretending to alchymy.

ALCOCALUM, Cynara scolymus.

AL'COHOL, Al'cahol, Alchool, Alkol, Alcol, Al'cool, Al'kool. An Arabic word, formerly used for an impalpable powder, and signifying 'very subtile, much divided.' At the present day it is applied to highly rectified spirit of wine:—see Spiritus rectificatus or rectified spirit, distilled from dried subcarbonate of potassa. In the Ph. U. S., Alcohol is rectified spirit of the specific gravity 0.835. The Dublin college has a spiritus fortior, used in the preparation of certain essences, whose specific gravity is .818. Alcohol, absolute alcohol, of the Edinburgh and Dublin Pharmacopœias, is of specific gravity .797.

Alcohol is an inflammable liquor, lighter than water, of a warm, acrid taste, colourless, transparent, and of a pungent, aromatic smell. It is the product of the distillation of vinous liquors; is miscible with water in all proportions, and is the direct solvent of resins, balsams, &c. Various other vegetable principles are soluble in it, and hence it is used, in different states of concentration, in the preparation of elixire, tinctures, essences, &c.

Alcohol acts on the animal body as a powerful stimulus: as such, in a dilute form, it is used in the prevention and cure of disease. Its habitual and inordinate use is the cause of many serious affections, of a chronic character especially, as visceral obstructions, dropsy, &c.

The study of aliments forms one of the most important branches of hygiene. They are confined to the organized kingdom,— the mineral affording none.

As regards the immediate principles which predominate in their composition, they have been classed, but imperfectly, as follows:—

TABLE OF ALIMENTS.

1. Feculaceous.	Wheat, barley, oats, rye, rice, Indian corn, potato, sago, peas, beans, &c.
2. Mucilaginous.	Carrot, salsify, beet, turnip, asparagus, cabbage, lettuce, artichoke, melon, &c.
3. Saccharine.	Sugar, fig, date, raisin, apricot, &c.
4. Acidulous.	Orange, currant, gooseberry, cherry, peach, strawberry, raspberry, mulberry, prune, pear, apple, sorrel, &c.
5. Oleaginous and Fatty.	Cocoa, olive, sweet almond, nut, walnut, animal fat, oil, butter, &c.
6. Caseous.	Different kinds of milk, cheese.
7. Gelatinous.	Tendon, aponeurosis, true skin, cellular texture; very young animals.
8. Albuminous.	Brain, nerve, eggs, &c.
9. Fibrinous.	Flesh and blood.

Dr. Prout has four great classes—the aqueous, saccharine, oleaginous, and albuminous: — Dr. Pereira, twelve — the aqueous, mucilaginous or gummy, saccharine, amylaceous, ligneous, pectinaceous, acidulous, alcoholic, oily or fatty, proteinaceous, gelatinous, and saline.

Liebig divides them into two classes: — the NITROGENIZED or PLASTIC ELEMENTS OF NUTRITION, in which he comprises vegetable fibrin, vegetable albumen, vegetable casein, flesh and blood; and the NON-NITROGENIZED ELEMENTS OF RESPIRATION, in which he comprises fat, starch, gum, cane sugar, grape sugar, sugar of milk, pectin, bassorin, wine, beer and spirits. The former alone, in his view, are inservient to the nutrition of organized tissue: the latter are burnt in respiration, and furnish heat.

The following simple arrangement is, perhaps, as little objectionable as any:—

1. Nitrogenized Aliments, (Albuminous, of Prout.)	Fibrinous (Glutinous?) Albuminous. Caseinous.
2. Non-nitrogenized Aliments,	Amylaceous. Saccharine. Oleaginous.

The second division might be still farther simplified, inasmuch as amylaceous aliments are convertible into sugar during the digestive process; and, from both, oleaginous matter may be formed.

As the allantois is developed, its walls become very vascular, and contain the ramifications of what become the umbilical artery and vein, which, by the elongation of the allantois, are brought through the villi of the chorion, into indirect communication with the vessels of the mother.

The patient lying on his mattress, the surgeon passes the linen belts beneath his body, attaching them to the hooks on the ends of the straps, and adjusting the whole at the proper distance and length, so as to balance the body exactly, and then raises it from the mattress by turning the handle of the windlass. AMMO'NIAC, GUM, Ammoni'acum (Ph. U. S.), Gum'mi Ammoni'acum, Armoni'acum, Mato'rium, (F.) Ammoniac, Gomme ammoniaque, so called from Ammonia in Lybia, whence it is brought. A gum-resin, the concrete juice of Jore'ma ammoni'acum, of Persia: a species of a genus allied to Ferula; and also the gum-resin of Fer'ula tingita'na. The latter is the ammoniacum of commerce. It is in irregular, dry masses and tears, yellow externally, whitish within. Its odour is peculiar, and not ungrateful: taste nauseous, sweet, and bitter. It forms a white emulsion with water: is soluble in vinegar; partially so in alcohol, ether, and solutions of the alcalies.

Gum ammoniacum is expectorant, deobstruent (?), antispasmodic, discutient, and resolvent. It is chiefly used, however, in the first capacity, and in the formation of certain plasters.

Two varieties are met with in the market, Guttæ ammoni'aci, the best; and Lapis ammoni'aci, the more impure.

(F.) Anesthésique; same etymon. as Anæsthesia. Relating to privation of feeling, as an "anæsthetic agent;" one that prevents feeling. The term is, now, almost restricted to agents, which produce such effect by being received into the lungs in the form of vapours or gases, and passing with the blood to the nervous centres on which their action is exerted. Perhaps, as a general rule, the intellectual faculties first feel their influence, —a sort of intoxication supervening, with imperfect power of regulating the movements; the sensory ganglia become afterwards or simultaneously affected, sensation and motion are suspended, and ultimately, if the quantity inhaled be sufficient, the medulla oblongata has its actions suspended or destroyed, respiration ceases, and death is the consequence. Different agents have been used as anæsthetics by way of inhalation — sulphuric ether, chloroform, chloric ether, compound ether, chlorobydric and nitric ethers, bisulphuret of carbon, chloride of olefiant gas, benzin, aldehyde, light coal-tar naphtha, &c.; but the first four are alone employed. They have been, and are, greatly used in serious surgical operations, and during parturition; and in such cases, as well as in many diseases, especially of a painful nature, produce the most beneficial results.

ANAT'OMY, Anat'omë, Anatom'ia, Anathom'ia, Prosec'tio, from ava, and τεμνειν, 'to cut,' (F.) Anatomie. The word Anatomy properly signifies dissection; but it has been appropriated to the study and knowledge of the number, shape, situation, structure, and connection—in a word, of all the apparent properties of organized bodies. Anatomy is the science of organization. Some have given the term a still more extended acceptation, applying it to every mechanical decomposition, even of inorganic bodies. Thus, Crystallography has been termed the Anatomy of crystallized minerals. Anatomy has also been called Morphol'ogy, Somatol'ogy, Somatot'omy, Organol'ogy, etc. It assumes different names, according as the study is confined to one organized being, or to a species or class of beings. Thus, Androt'omy, or Anthropot'omy, or Anthropog'raphy, or Anthroposomatol'ogy, is the Anatomy of Man; Zoötomy, that of the other species of the animal kingdom; and Vet'erinary Anat'omy is the anatomy of domestic animals; but when the word is used abstractly, it means Human Anatomy, and particularly the study of the organs in a physiological or healthy state. Physiolog''ical Anatomy is occasionally used to signify the kind of anatomy which investigates structure with a special view to function. The Anatomy of the diseased human body is called Patholog''ical or Morbid Anatomy, and when applied to Medical Jurisprudence, Foren'sic Anatomy. Several of the organs possessing a similarity of structure, and being formed of the same tissues, they have been grouped into Systems or Genera of Organs; and the study of, or acquaintance with, such systems, has been called General Anat'omy, Histol'ogy, or Morphot'omy, whilst the study of each organ in particular has been termed Descriptive Anatomy, Anthropomorphol'ogy. Histology is, however, more frequently applied to the Anatomy of the Tissues, which is called, also, Tex'tural and Microscop'ic Anatomy, Micranotom'ia, see Histology. Descriptive Anatomy has been divided into Skeletol'ogy, which comprises Osteol'ogy and Syndesmol'ogy; and into Sarcol'ogy, which is subdivided into Myol'ogy, Neurol'ogy, Angiol'ogy, Adenol'ogy, Splanchnol'ogy, and Dermol'ogy. Sur'gical Anat'omy, Medico-Chirurgical Anat'omy, Topograph'ical Anat'omy, Re'gional Anat'omy, (F.) Anatomie Chirurgicale, A. des Régions, is the particular and relative study of the bones, muscles, nerves, vessels, etc., with which it is indispensable to be acquainted before performing operations. Compar'ative Anat'omy is the comparative study of each organ, with a view to an acquaintance with the modifications of its structure in different animals or in the different classes of animals. Transcendent'al or Philosoph'ical Anatomy inquires into the mode, plan, or model upon which the animal frame or organs are formed; and Artifi'cial Anat'omy is the art of modelling and representing, in wax or other substance, the different organs or different parts of the human body, in the sound or diseased state. Phytot'omy is the anatomy of vegetables, and Picto'rial Anatomy, anatomy artistically illustrated.

AN'EURISM, Aneurys'ma, Aneurys'mus, Aneuris'ma, Cedma, from ανευρυνειν, (ava, and ευρυνειν,) 'to dilate or distend.' Dilata'tio Arteria'rum, Ecta'sia, Emborys'ma, Exangi'a aneuris'ma, Arterieurys'ma, Artereurys'ma, Hæmatoce'lē arterio'sa, Abscessus spirituo'sus, Arteriec'tasis, (F.) Anévrysme, Aneurisme. Properly, Aneurism signifies a tumour, produced by the dilatation of an artery; but it has been extended to various lesions of arteries, as well as to dilatations of the heart.

There are various kinds of aneurism. The following are the chief:

I. When the blood, which forms the tumour, is enclosed within the dilated coats of the artery. This is the TRUE ANEURISM, Aneurys'ma verum, Hernia Arteria'rum, (F.) Anévrysme vrai.

II. When the blood has escaped from the opened artery, it is called SPURIOUS or FALSE ANEURISM, Aneuris'ma spu'rium, Ruptu'ra Arteriæ, Arteriorrhex'is, Arteriodial'ysis, Ecchymo'ma arterio'sum, (F.) Anévrysme faux. The latter is divided into three varieties:

1. Diffused False Aneurism, (F.) Anévrysme faux, primitif, diffus, nonciconscrit ou par infiltration, which occurs immediately after the division or rupture of an artery, and consists of an extravasation of blood into the areolar texture of the part.

2. Circumscribed False Aneurism, (F.) Anévrysme faux consécutif, circonscrit ou par épanchement, enkysté ou sacciforme, tumeur hémorrhagiale circonscrite, in which the blood issues from the vessel some time after the receipt of the wound, and forms itself a sac in the neighbouring areolar membrane.

3. An'eurism by Anastomo'sis, Var'icose or Circoid An'eurism, Phlebarteriodial'ysis, Aneurys'ma veno'so-arterio'sum, A. varico'sum, (F.) Anévrysme par anastomose ou variqueux, A. par érosion, A. de POTT, A. des plus petites artères, which arises from the simultaneous wounding of an artery and vein; — the arterial blood passing into the vein, and producing a varicose state of it.

III. MIXED ANEURISM, (F.) Anévrysme mixte, is that which arises from the dilatation of one or two of the coats, with division or rupture of the other Some authors have made two varieties of this:

1. Mixed external Aneurism, where the internal and middle coats are ruptured, and the areolar is dilated.

2. Mixed internal Aneurism, in which the internal coat is dilated, and protrudes, like a hernial sac, through the ruptured middle and outer coats. This variety has been called Aneurys'ma Her'niam Arteriæ sistens.

Aneurisms have been termed traumat'ic or exog''enous, and sponta'neous, according as they may have been caused by a wound, or have originated spontaneously. The latter, when originating from lesions of the inner coats of arteries, have been termed endog''enous. They have also been divided into internal and external.

The internal aneurisms are situate in the great splanchnic cavities, and occur in the heart and great vessels of the chest, abdomen, &c. Their diagnosis is difficult, and they are often inaccessible to surgical treatment.

The external aneurisms are situate at the exterior of the head, neck, and limbs, and are distinctly pulsatory.

Aneurisms, especially the internal, may be combated by a debilitant treatment, on the plan of Valsalva, which consists in repeated bloodletting, with food enough merely to support life. In external aneurism, the artery can be obliterated. This is usually done by applying a ligature above the aneurismal tumour.

Aneurism, Dissecting, is one in which, owing to rupture of the inner and middle coats of an artery, the blood makes itself a channel between these coats and the outer coat.

In many cases, the lesion appears to consist in a separation of the laminæ of the middle coat, bétween which the blood forms itself a channel.

Aneurisms of the Heart, Cardiov'chi, Cardieurys'ma, (F.) Anévrysmes du cœur, have been divided into active and passive. The former can scarcely be esteemed aneurisms, as they most commonly consist of increased thickness of the parietes of the heart, which diminishes its cavity instead of increasing it. The term Hypertrophy of the heart better indicates their character. Passive aneurism, Cardiec'tasis, on the contrary, is attended with extenuation of the parietes of the organ, and enlargement of the cavities. The physical signs of dilatation of the heart are the following:—The action of the heart is not visible, and no impulse is conveyed to the hand. On percussion, there is a loss of resonance over a larger surface than usual, but the dulness is much less intense than that which accompanies hypertrophy. On auscultation, the action of the heart is only slightly felt, and communicates at once the impression of its diminished power. The impulse is feebler than usual. Both sounds are widely transmitted over the thorax, and are not much fainter at a distance from their point of origin.

Partial or true aneurism of the Heart—Cardiec'tasis partia'lis, Aneurys'ma consecuti'vum cordis—is sometimes seen; rarely, however.

The name Aneurism of the Valves of the Heart has been given to pouch-like projections of the valves into the auricles.

in regard to the small number of parts which are drawn into morbid consent with the affected cardiac nerves, than in regard either to its nature or appropriate treatment. The most powerful stimulating and narcotic antispasmodics are required during the paroxysm.

ANGLE, An'gulus, from αγκυλος, 'a hook.' The space between two lines which meet in a point.

Angle, Fa'cial, pointed out by Camper, is formed by the union of two lines, one of which is drawn from the most prominent part of the forehead to the alveolar edge of the upper jaw, opposite the incisor teeth—the facial line—and the other from the meatus auditorius externus to the same point of the jaw. According to the size of the angle it has been attempted to appreciate the respective proportions of the cranium and face, and, to a certain extent, the degree of intelligence of individuals and of animals. In the white varieties of the species, this angle is generally 80°; in the negro not more than 70°, and sometimes only 65°. As we descend the scale of animals, the angle becomes less and less; until, in fishes, it nearly or entirely disappears. Animals which have the snout long, and facial angle small, such as the snipe, crane, stork, &c., are proverbially foolish, at least they are so esteemed; whilst intelligence is ascribed to those in which the angle is more largely developed, as the elephant and the owl. In these last animals, however, the large facial angle is caused by the size of the frontal sinuses:—so that this mode of appreciating the size of the brain is very inexact, and cannot be depended upon.

The following is a table of the angle in man and certain animals:

FACIAL ANGLES.

Man	from 68° to 88° and more.
Sapajou	65
Orang-Utang	56 to 58
Guenon	57
Mandrill	30 to 42
Coati	28
Pole-Cat	31

Mastiff	41
Hare	30
Ram	30
Horse	23

Angle, Occipital, of Daubenton, is formed by a line drawn from the posterior margin of the foramen magnum to the inferior margin of the orbit, and another drawn from the top of the head to the space between the occipital condyles. In man, these condyles, as well as the foramen magnum, are so situate, that a line drawn perpendicular to them would be a continuation of the spine; but in animals they are placed more or less obliquely; and the perpendicular is necessarily thrown farther forward, and the angle rendered more acute.

Angle, Optic, (F.) Angle optique, is the angle formed by two lines, which shave the extremities of an object, and meet at the centre of the pupil.

The precise seat of the mind in the brain has given rise to many speculations. The point is unsettled.

With the ancient chemists, Anima meant the active principle of a drug separated by som chemical management.

The filtered liquor is placed on the fire in an iron vessel, and suffered to evaporate, until neither froth nor effervescence occurs, and the liquid presents a smooth surface like oil. To this, levigated coal is added in the proportion of 160 grammes to 192 grammes of potassa. The mixture is stirred, and removed from the fire, and the stirring is continued, until a black homogeneous powder results. A sulphuretted anthrakokali is made by mixing accurately 16 grammes of sulphur with the coal, and dissolving the mixture in the potassa, as directed above. It has been thought by some to be induced altogether by contact with the matter of the carbuncle of animals, or of the exuviæ of the bodies of such as had died of the disease, but it is now known to arise primarily in the human subject. This form of carbuncle has received different names, many of them from the places where it has prevailed: — Carbun'culus contagio'sus seu Gal'licus seu Hunga'ricus seu Polon'icus seu Septentriona'lis, Morbus pustulo'sus Fin'nicus, Pus'tula gangrænosa seu Liv'ida Estho'niæ, Pemphigus Hungar'icus, Puce de Bourgogne.

It is probable that Hippocrates meant by ἀορται the bronchia and their ramifications. The aorta is the common trunk of the arteries of the body. It arises from the left ventricle of the heart, about opposite to the fifth dorsal vertebra, passes upwards (ascending Aorta), forms the great arch of the Aorta, and descends along the left of the spine (descending Aorta), until it reaches the middle of the fourth or fifth lumbar vertebra, where it bifurcates, to give origin to the common iliacs. AP'OPLEXY, Apoplex'ia, (Sc.) Poplesy, from ἀποπλήττειν, 'to strike with violence.' At the present day, the term apoplexy is employed by many writers to signify interstitial hemorrhage, (F.) Hémorrhagie interstitielle, or every effusion of blood, which occurs suddenly into the substance of an organ or tissue. Hence, we speak of cerebral apoplexy, pulmonary apoplexy, &c. &c. Formerly it was always — and still is by many — used in a restricted sense, to signify, in other words, the train of phenomena, which characterize cerebral apoplexy. This disease, Hæmorrha'gia Cer'ebri, Aphro'nia, Carus Apoplex'ia, Coma Apoplex'ia, Apoplex'ia cer'ebri sanguin'ea seu cerebra'lis, Encephalorrhag''ia, Sanguinis ictus, Hæmatenceph'alum, Pulpex'ia, Sidera'tio, Apileps'ia, Morbus atton'itus, Gutta, Theophle'gia, Theoplex'ia, (F.) Apoplexie, A. cérébrale, Hématoëncephalie, Coup de sang, is characterized by diminution, or loss of sensation and mental manifestation; by the cessation, more or less complete, of motion; and by a comatose state,—circulation and respiration continuing. It generally consists in pressure upon the brain; either from turgescence of vessels, or from extravasation of blood: hence the terms Hæmenceph'alus, Hémorrhagie cérébrale, and Hémoëncephalorrhagie, applied to it by some. The general prognosis is unfavourable; especially when it occurs after the age of 35. When Apoplexy is accompanied with a hard, full pulse, and flushed countenance, it is called Apoplex'ia sanguin'ea, Cataph'ora Coma; when with a feeble pulse and pale countenance, and evidences of serous effusion, Apoplex'ia sero'sa, A. pituito'sa, Serous Apoplexy, Cataph'ora hydrocephal'ica, Encephaloch'ysis seni'lis, Hydrocephal'alus acu'tus senum, Hydroëncephalorrhée, (Piorry,) Hydropisie cérébrale suraiguë, Hydrorrhagie.

The chief additions made by them to medical science were in the departments of pharmacy and in the description of diseases. Celsus and Galen called thus the membrane of the vitreous humour,— the tunica hyaloidea. The moderns use it now for one of the membranes of the brain, situate between the dura mater and pia mater. It is a serous membrane, and composed of two layers; the external being confounded, in the greater part of its extent, with the dura mater, and, like it, lining the interior of the cranium and spinal canal; the other being extended over the brain, from which it is separated by the pia mater, without passing into the sinuosities between the convolutions, and penetrating into the interior of the brain by an opening at its posterior part under the corpus callosum. It forms a part of the investing sheath of the nerves, as they pass from the encephalic cavities. Besides this chief archæus, whose seat Van Helmont placed in the upper orifice of the stomach, he admitted several of a subordinate character, which had to execute its orders; one, for instance, in each organ, to preside over its functions; each of them being subject to anger, caprice, terror, and every human feeling.

The former opinion seems to have prevailed — Archiatre des Rois de France being applied to the chief physician to the kings of France.

The Areometer of Baumé, which is the most used in Pharmacy, particularly in France, consists of a tube of glass, largely expanded towards its inferior extremity, and terminating below by a small ball, containing mercury or lead, which serves it as a balance, so that it may remain upright in the fluid. This tube is furnished with a graduated scale. If the fluid into which the Areometer is plunged be heavier than water, the instrument rises; if lighter, it sinks. There are various Areometers, as those of the Dutch, of Fahrenheit, Nicholson, &c. The Areometer is also called Hydrom'eter, (F.) Aréomètre, Pèse-liqueur.

There are some hydrometers which have a general application for determining the specific gravities of liquids—as Fahrenheit's, Nicholson's, Guyton de Morveau's, and the common glass hydrometers, including Baumé's, Cartier's, Twaddle's, Zanetti's, and the specific gravity beads; others intended for special application—as for estimating the comparative strength of spirits; the comparative densities of syrups, oils, &c.—as Gay Lussac's, Sikes's, and Dicat's hydrometers, and the saccharometer, urinometer, and elæometer.

Argen'ti Nitras, Argen'tum Nitra'tum seu Nit'ricum, Sal argen'ti, (F.) Nitrate ou Azotate d'Argent, Nitrate of Silver. This preparation is sometimes kept in crystals, the Nitras Argen'ti in crystal'los concre'tus, Nitrate d'Argent crystallisé of the Codex of Paris, Luna potab'ilis, Crystalli Lunæ, Argen'tum nit'ricum crystallisa'tum, Nitras argenti crystal'linus, Nitrum luna'rē, Hydrago'gum Boy'lei. Generally, however, it is in the fused state: and it is this which is admitted into most Pharmacopœias, and which, besides the name Nitras Argenti, is called Nit'ras argen'ti fusus seu fusum. Caus'ticum luna'rē, Lapis infernal'is, Argen'tum nit'ricum fusum, and lunar caustic, (F.) Nitrate d'argent fondu, Pierre infernale.

In the Pharmacopœia of the United States, it is directed to be prepared as follows:—Take of silver, in small pieces, ℥j; nitric acid, f℥vij, distilled water, f℥ij. Mix the acid with the water, and dissolve the silver in the mixture in a sand bath; then crystallize, or gradually increase the heat, so that the resulting salt may be dried. Melt this in a crucible over a gentle fire, and continue the heat until ebullition ceases; then immediately pour it into suitable moulds.

The virtues of nitrate of silver are tonic, and escharotic. It is given in chorea, epilepsy, &c.: locally, it is used in various cases as an escharotic. Dose, gr. 1-8 to gr. 1-4 in pill, three times a day.

When silver is combined with iodine, it is said to have the same effect as the nitrate, and not to produce the slate colour of the surface, which is apt to follow the protracted use of the latter.

ARGENTILLA VULGARIS, Potentilla anserina.

AR'GENTINE, Argento'sus, same etymon as the next. Pertaining to silver; as an 'argentine solution,' or solution of a salt of silver.

ARGEN'TUM, Ar'gyrus, from ἀργος, 'white,' Silver, Luna, Dia'na. (F.) Argent. A solid metal of a shining white appearance; insipid; inodorous; highly sonorous; malleable and ductile; somewhat hard; crystallizable in triangular pyramids; fusible a little above a red heat, and volatizable; s. g. 10.4. Not used in medicine, unless in some places for silvering pills. Silver Leaf, Argen'tum folia'tum, is the state in which it is used for this purpose.

Argentum Divi'sum, metallic silver, in very fine powder, has been recommended internally in syphilis.

The Chloride (Argen'ti chlo'ridum, Argen'tum muriat'icum seu chlora'tum seu sali'tum. Chlorure'tum Argen'ti, Chlor'uret or Mu'riate of Silver, (F.) Chlorure d'Argent); the Cyanuret; the Iodide (Argen'ti Io'didum, Argen'tum Ioda'tum, Iodure'tum Argen'ti, Iod'uret of Silver, (F.) Iodure d'Argent;) the Oxide (Argen'ti ox'idum, Argen'tum oxyda'tum, (F.) Oxide d'Argent), and the Chloride of Ammonia and Silver (Argen'ti et Ammo'niæ chlo'ridum, Argen'tum muriat'icum ammonia'tum, Chlorure'tum Argen'ti et Ammoniæ, Chlo'ruret of Silver and Ammonia, Ammonio-chloride of Silver, (F.) Chlorure d'Argent et d'Ammoniaque), have been used in syphilis. At first, these different preparations were administered iatraleptically on the gums; the chloride, the cyanide and the iodide in the dose of 1-12th of a grain; the chloride of silver and ammonia in the dose of 1-14th of a grain, and the oxide of silver and divided silver in the dose of 1-8th and 1-4th of a grain. M. Serre, of Montpellier, who made many trials with them, soon found that these doses were too small; he therefore raised that of the chloride to 1-10th, and of the iodide to 1-8th of a grain, without any inconvenience resulting. The dose of the other preparations was likewise increased in a similar ratio. M. Serre extols the preparations of silver—used internally as well as iatraleptically—as antisyphilitics, but they are not to be depended upon.

The Cyanuret or Cyanide of Silver, Argen'ti Cyanure'tum seu Cyan'idum, Argen'tum cyanogena'tum, (F.) Cyanure d'argent, is thus directed to be prepared in the Ph. U. S. (1842,) Argent. Nit. ℥xv, Acid Hydrocyan., Aq. destillat. āā ℥j. Having dissolved the nitrate of silver in the water, add the hydrocyanic acid, and mix them. Wash the precipitate with distilled water and dry it. In the last edition of the Pharmacopœia, (1851,) it is directed to be prepared as follows:—Nitrate of Silver, dissolved in distilled water, is put into a tubulated glass receiver; Ferocyanuret of Potassium, dissolved in distilled water, is put into a tubulated retort, previously adapted to the receiver. Dilute Sulphuric Acid is added to the solution in the retort; and, by means of a sand-bath and a moderate heat, distillation is carried on until the liquid that passes over no longer produces a precipitate in the receiver. The precipitate is then washed with distilled water, and dried.

The Oxide of Silver, Argen'ti Ox'idum, has been introduced into the last edition of the Ph. U. S. (1851). It is made by precipitating a solution of the Nitrate of Silver by solution of Potassa, drying the precipitate.

The dose to a very young child is from ℥ss to ℥j; to older children from ℥j to ℥ij.

ARTE'RIAL DUCT, Canal'is arterio'sus, Ductus arterio'sus seu Botal'lii, (F.) Canal artériel, C. Pulmo-aortique, is the portion of the pulmonary artery which terminates in the aorta in the fœtus. When this duct is obliterated after birth, it is called Arte'rial Lig'ament, Ligamen'tum arterio'sum, (F.) Ligament artériel.

ARTERIOSTENO'SIS, from αρτηρια, 'artery,' and στενος, 'contracted.' Contraction or obliteration of an artery.

ARTERIOT'OMY, Arteriotom'ia, from αρτηρια, 'an artery,' and τεμνω, 'I cut.' This word has been used for the dissection of arteries. Most commonly, however, it means a surgical operation, which consists in opening an artery, to draw blood from it. Arteriotomy is chiefly used in inflammatory affections of the head, when the blood is generally obtained from the temporal artery. See Bloodletting.

ARTERI'TIS, Arteri''tis, Inflamma'tio Arteria'rum, (F.) Artérite, Inflammation des artères; from αρτηρια, 'an artery,' and itis, a termination denoting inflammation. Inflammation of an artery. Inflammation of the inner coat of an artery is termed Endo-arteri'tis, or Endoarteri'tis; of the outer, Exo-arteri'tis or Exarteri'tis.

AR'TERY, Arte'ria, (F.) Artère, from αηρ, 'air,' and ρηειν, 'to preserve,' quasi, 'receptacle of air,' because the ancients believed that it contained air. They, at first, gave the name Artery to the trachea, αρτηρια τραχεια, because it is filled with air; and afterwards they used the same term for the arteries, properly so called, probably because they commonly found them empty in the dead body. We find, also, φλεβες to designate the arteries, called by the Latins Venæ micantes pulsatiles. Arteries, with the moderns, signify the order of vessels, which arise from the two ventricles of the heart, and have valves only at their origin. They are cylindrical, firm, and elastic canals; of a yellowish white colour; little dilatable; easily lacerable; and formed, 1. Of an external, laminated, or areolar membrane, Tu'nica externa seu adventit'ia seu cellula'ris, Vagina cellula'ris, of a dense and close character. 2. Of a middle coat, Tu'nica me'dia seu elas'tica, composed of fibres, which do not, however, contract on the application of the galvanic stimulus, formed chiefly of elastic tissue, and also of smooth muscular fibres, and eminently elastic; and, 3. Of an inner coat, Tu'nica in'tima seu glabra, which is thin, diaphanous, reddish, and polished.

The use of the arteries is to carry the blood from the heart to the various parts of the system. It will be obvious, however, that they cannot all convey arterial blood. The pulmonary artery, for example, is destined to convey the venous blood to the lungs, there to be converted into arterial; whilst the pulmonary veins convey arterial blood back to the heart.

TABLE OF THE PRINCIPAL ARTERIES OF THE BODY.

All the arteries take their rise from the Pulmonary Artery, or the Aorta; and the names generally indicate the parts to which they are distributed.

I. Arteria Pulmonalis.

The Pulmonary Artery arises from the right ventricle, and soon divides into a right and left branch, one of which is distributed to each lung.

II. Arteria Aorta.

The Aorta arises from the left ventricle. It is the common trunk of the arteries of the body, and may be divided into five portions.

a. Arteries furnished by the Aorta at its origin.

1. A. Cardiaca or coronaria anterior.
2. A. Cardiaca or coronaria posterior.

b. Arteries furnished by the Aorta at its arch.

ARTIC'ULAR AR'TERIES OF THE KNEE arise from the popliteal artery, and surround the tibiofemoral articulation. Although of a small size, they are important, as they furnish blood to the lower extremity after the operation for popliteal aneurism. They are distinguished into superior and inferior. The superior articular arteries, popliteal articular arteries, are commonly three in number; one of which is internal, another external, and another middle, the azygous articular. The first, Ramus anastomot'icus magnus, anastomoses by one branch with the external circumflex, and by another with the external superior articular. The second anastomoses with the external circumflex, the superior internal articular, and the inferior external articular; and the third is distributed within the joint. The inferior articular arteries are two in number: an internal and external. The former anastomoses with the internal superior articular and the external inferior articular. The latter anastomoses with the recurrent branch of the anterior tibial, and the external superior articular. To each articular artery there is an articular nerve.

Owing to the supply of air being cut off, the unchanged venous blood of the pulmonary artery passes into the minute radicles of the pulmonary veins, but their peculiar excitability requiring arterial blood to excite them, stagnation takes places in the pulmonary radicles, and death occurs chiefly from this cause, — not owing to venous blood being distributed through the system, and 'poisoning' it, as was the idea of Bichat. Carus asphyx'ia, Mors appa'rens, More putati've, Pseudothan'atos, Apparent death, (F.) Mort apparente, is characterized by suspension of respiration, of the cerebral functions, &c. Several varieties of Asphyxia have been designated.

3. ASPHYX'IA BY STRANGULA'TION, or Suffoca'tion; produced by mechanical impediment to respiration, as in hanging.

4. ASPHYX'IA BY SUBMER'SION, A. by drowning, A. Immerso'rum, Angiairhydrie (Piorry), as occurs in the drowned, who perish in consequence of the medium in which they are plunged, being unfit for respiration. See Submersion.

Difficulty of breathing, recurring at intervals, accompanied with a wheezing sound and sense of constriction in the chest; cough and expectoration.

Asthma is a chronic disease, and not curable with facility. Excitant and narcotic antispasmodics are required.

There are no pathognomonic physical signs of asthma. In some cases, the respiration is universally puerile during the attack. In the spasmodic form, the respiratory murmur is very feeble or absent during the fit; and in all forms percussion elicits a clear pulmonary sound. The disease generally consists in some source of irritation, and occasionally, perhaps, in paralysis of the pneumogastric nerves, Bronchoparal'ysis, Paral'ysis nervi vagi in parte thorac''ica, more frequently of the former — all the phenomena indicating constriction of the smaller bronchial ramifications. The treatment is one that relieves spasmodic action — narcotics, counter-irritants, change of air, &c.

The water contains a small quantity of sulphohydric acid, carbonic acid, sulphates of lime and magnesia, carbonates of lime and iron, and a bituminous substance. Temp. 67° Fahr. It is much used in chronic rheumatism, herpes, scrofulous diseases, &c.

AUDITIF, Auditory.

AUDIT'ION, from audire, auditum, 'to hear;' Audit''io, Audi'tus, A'coē, Acoē'sis, Acu'sis, (F.) Ouïe, Hearing. The act of hearing. The sensation arising from an impression made on the auditory nerves by the vibrations of the air, produced by a sonorous body. The physiology of Audition is obscure. It probably takes place:—1. By the vibrations being communicated from the membrana tympani along the chain of small bones to the membrane of the foramen ovale. 2. By means of the air in the cavity of the tympanum, the membrane of the foramen rotundum is agitated. 3. The transmission may be made by means of the bony parietes. In these three ways the vibrations produced by a sonorous body may reach the auditory nerve. Audition may be active or passive: hence the difference between listening and simply hearing.

AU'DITORY, Audito'rius, Auditi'vus, Acus'ticus, (F.) Auditif. That which relates to audition.

AUDITORY ARTERIES AND VEINS, are vessels which enter the auditory canals, and are, like them, distinguished into internal and external. The external auditory artery, A. Tympanique—(Ch.) is given off by the styloid, a branch of the external carotid: the internal is a branch of the basilary artery, which accompanies the auditory nerve, and is distributed to it. The Auditory Veins empty into the internal and external jugulars.

AUDITORY CANAL, EXTERNAL, Mea'tus audito'rius exter'nus, Alvea'rium, Scapha, Scaphus, (F.) Conduit auditif externe, Conduit auriculaire, commences at the bottom of the concha, at the Fora'men auditi'vum exter'num, passes inwards, forwards, and a little downwards, and terminates at the membrana tympani. It is partly cartilaginous, partly osseous, and partly fibrous.

AUDITORY CANAL, INTERNAL, Mea'tus audito'rius inter'nus, Porus seu Sinus acus'ticus, Cyar, (F.) Conduit auditif interne, C. labyrinthique, is situate on the posterior surface of the pars petrosa of the temporal bone. From the Fora'men auditi'vum inter'num, where it commences, it passes forwards and outwards, and terminates by a kind of cul-de-sac, mac'ula cribro'sa, perforated by many holes, one of which is the orifice of the Aquæductus Fallopii; and the others communicate with the labyrinth.

AUDITORY NERVE, Nervus audito'rius seu acus'ticus, Nerf labyrinthique—(Ch.), is the Portio Mollis of the seventh pair. It arises from the corpus restiforme, from the floor of the fourth ventricle, and by means of white striæ from the sides of the calamus scriptorius. As it leaves the encephalon, it forms a flattened cord, and proceeds with the facial nerve through the foramen auditivum internum, and as far as the bottom of the meatus, where it separates from the facial, and divides into two branches, one going to the cochlea, the cochlear; the other to the vestibule and semi-circular canals, the vestibular.

AUGĒ, Al'veus. Some of the older anatomists gave this name to a reservoir, into which liquids flow in an interrupted manner, so that it is alternately full and empty. Such are the ventricles and auricles of the heart.

In Pathology, Aura means the sensation of a light vapour, which, in some diseases, appears to set out from the trunk or limbs; and to rise towards the head. This feeling has been found to precede attacks of epilepsy and hysteria, and hence it has been called Aura Epilep'tica, and A. hyster'ica.

AURICLES OF THE HEART, Auric'ulæ, A'tria, Cavita'tes innomina'tæ, (F.) Oreillettes, are two cavities, one right, the other left, each communicating with the ventricle of its side. These two cavities receive the blood from every part of the body. Into the right auricle, the two venæ cavæ and coronary vein open: into the left, the four pulmonary veins. AURIC'ULAR AR'TERIES AND VEINS, Oriculaires—(Ch.), are divided into anterior and posterior. The anterior are of indeterminate number. They arise from the temporal artery, and are distributed to the meatus auditorius externus, and to the pavilion of the ear. The posterior auricular is given off by the external carotid, from which it separates in the substance of the parotid gland. When it reaches the inferior part of the pavilion of the ear it bifurcates; one of its branches being distributed to the inner surface of the pavilion, the other passing over the mastoid process, and being distributed to the temporal and posterior auris muscles, &c. Before its bifurcation it gives off the stylo-mastoid artery. The Anterior and Posterior Auricular Veins open into the temporal and external jugular.

AURICULAR FINGER, (F.) Doigt auriculaire, is the little finger, so called because, owing to its size, it can be more readily introduced into the meatus auditorius.

AURICULAR NERVES are several. 1. The auricular branch, Zygomato-auricular, is one of the ascending branches of the cervical plexus. It ramifies and spreads over the two surfaces of the pavilion. 2. The auricular or superficial temporal, Temporal-cutaneous—(Ch.), is given off from the inferior maxillary. It ascends between the condyle of the jaw and the meatus auditorius externus, sends numerous filaments to the meatus and pavilion, and divides into two twigs, which accompany the branches of the temporal artery, and are distributed to the integuments of the head. There is also a posterior auricular furnished by the facial.

BAN'DAGE, Desma, Syndes'mus, Hypodes'mis, Hypodesma, Hypodes'mus, (the last three signify properly an under bandage.) A binder, from Sax. bindan, 'to bind.' This word, with the French, is generally used to express the methodical application of rollers, compresses, &c., Ban'daging, Syn'desis, to fix an apparatus upon any part,—corresponding to the words deliga'tio, fascia'tio, fascia'rum applica'tio, epid'esis. With us the noun is usually applied to the result of the application, or to the bandage itself:—a sense in which the French employ the word Bande. Bandages are simple or compound. The simple bandage is equal, if the turns are applied circularly above each other; unequal, if the turns are not accurately applied upon each other. If each turn of the bandage be only covered one-third, it forms the doloire of the French; if the edges touch only slightly, it is the mousse; if the turns are very oblique and separated, it is the spiral or creeping, (F.) rampant; if folded upon each other, it is termed the reversed, (F.) renversé. By uniting various kinds of bandaging, we have the compound; and these compound bandages have received various names expressive of their figure, or of the parts to which they are applied, as capistrum, spica, &c. Bandages are divided, also, as regards their uses, into uniting, dividing, retaining, expelling, compressing, &c.

BANDAGE OR ROLLER, Fas'cia, Tæ'nia, Epides'mos, Vin'culum, the Bande of the French. It may be made of linen, flannel, or other stuff capable of offering a certain resistance. The two extremities of a bandage are called tails, (F.) chefs, and the rolled part is termed its head, (F.) globe. If rolled at both extremities, it is called a double-headed roller or bandage, (F.) Bande à deux globes.

BANDAGE À BANDELETTES SÉPARÉES, Bandage of separate strips.

BANDAGE, BODY, Manti'lè, (F.) Bandage de Corps, is used for fixing dressings, &c., to the trunk. It is formed of a towel, napkin, or some large compress, folded three or four times; the extremities of which are fastened by pins. This is again fixed by means of the scapulary bandage, which is nothing more than an ordinary bandage, stitched to the anterior and middle part of the napkin, passing over the clavicles and behind the head, to be attached to the back part of the napkin.

BANDAGE, COMPOUND, see Bandage.

BANDAGE, COMPRESSING, or ROLLER, Fascia compressi'va seu convolu'ta, (F.) Bandage compressive ou roulé, is the simple roller with one head; and is employed in cases of ulcers, varices, &c., of the limbs. Whenever this roller is applied to the lower part of the limbs, it is carried upwards by the doloire and reversed methods above described.

This bandage is made of a longitudinal portion of a common roller; and with a sufficient number of transverse pieces or tails, to cover as much of the part as is requisite. It is a very useful bandage, inasmuch as it can be undone without disturbing the part.

To the lower extremity of this, one or two bandages are attached, which pass under the thigh, and are fixed to the posterior part of the cincture. This bandage may be either simple or double.

Syst.* Dioecia Pentandria. The leaves and flowers of Cannabis are narcotic and astringent. They are chewed and smoked. The seeds, mixed with opium, areca, and sugar, produce a kind of intoxication, and are used for this purpose by the people of India. An alcoholic extract of the plant, Churrus—Extrac'tum Can'nabis (Ph. U. S.)—has been used in India, and since then in Europe and in this country, as a narcotic and anti-convulsive, in the dose of from half a grain to ten or more. It requires, however, great caution in its administration. The pure resin — Cannabine, Haschischine — is active in the dose of two-thirds of a grain.

The dried plant, which has flowered, and from which the resin has not been removed, called Gunjah, Ganjah, Guaza, and Guazah, Haschisch, Haschich, Hachisch, Hashish, or Chaschisch, of the Arabs, consists of the tops and tender parts only of the plant, collected immediately after inflorescence, and simply dried.

It ought to be entirely free from fat or grease.—Dr. E. J. Seymour.

Essence of beef—as it has been called—may be made by putting a pound of good beef, freed from fat, and cut into small pieces, into a porter-bottle, corking lightly. The bottle must be put into boiling water, and kept there until the water has been boiling at least half an hour. As the boiling goes on, the cork may be inserted a little more tightly, to retain the contents of the bottle. The juices of the beef are thus separated, and constitute the 'essence,' which may be seasoned to the taste. It contains much nutriment.

Various articles produce this effect, as cantharides, mustard, garou, euphorbium, garlic, ammonia, &c. Blisters are used as counter-irritants. By exciting a disease artificially on the surface, we can often remove another which may be at the time existing internally. A perpetual blister is one that is kept open for a longer or a shorter time by means of appropriate dressings.

BLOOD, Anglo-Saxon, blo᷑, from ble᷑an, 'to bleed.' Sanguis, Cruor, Lapis anima'lis, Hæma, ᾽αιμα, (Old Eng.) Blede, (F.) Sang. An animal fluid formed chiefly from the chyle; acquiring important properties during respiration; entering every organ through the circulation; distributing the nutritive principles to every texture, and the source of every secretion. The blood is white in the molluscous and inferior animals, which have been, hence, called white-blooded, to distinguish them from the red-blooded, which class includes the mammalia, birds, reptiles, and fishes. Human blood is composed of water, albumen, fibrin, an animal colouring substance, a little fatty matter—hæmatelæ'um—and different salts; as chlorides of potassium and sodium, phosphate of lime, subcarbonate of soda, lime, magnesia, oxide of iron, and lactate of soda, united with an animal matter. Arterial blood is of a florid red colour, strong smell; s. g. 1.049. Venous blood is of a brownish red; s. g. 1.051. The difference in colour has given occasion to the first being called red blood; the latter, black. The former, which is distributed from the heart, is nearly the same through its whole extent: the latter is the remains of the arterial blood after the different elements have been taken from it in nutrition, and probably differs in composition. It likewise contains different substances absorbed. Venous blood, taken from a vessel and left to itself, becomes solid, and separates into two distinct parts,—the serum or watery supernatant fluid; and the cruor, coag'ulum, crassamen'tum, hepar seu placen'ta san'guinis, placen'ta cruo'ris, in'sula, thrombus, or clot. The serum is chiefly water, holding albumen in solution and the salts of the blood. The clot contains the fibrin, colouring matter—hæmatosin, a little serum, and a small quantity of salts. M. Le Canu found the blood to be composed—in 1000 parts—of water, 785.590; albumen, 69.415; fibrin, 3.565; colouring matter, 119.626; crystallizable fatty matter, 4.300; oily matter, 2.270; extractive matter soluble in alcohol and water, 1.920; albumen combined with soda, 2.010; chlorides of sodium and potassium; alkaline phosphates, sulphates, and subcarbonates, 7.304; subcarbonate of lime and magnesia, phosphate of lime, magnesia and iron, peroxide of iron, 1.414; loss, 2.586. The four principal components of the blood are fibrin, albumen, corpuscles, and saline matter. In the circulating blood they are thus combined—

Fibrin, Albumen, Salts, } In solution forming Liquor Sanguinis.

Red Corpuscles — suspended in the Liquor Sanguinis.

In coagulated blood they are thus combined:

Fibrin, Red Corpuscles, } Forming the crassamentum or clot.

Albumen, Salts, } Remaining in solution, forming serum.

The following table exhibits the computations of different physiologists regarding the weight of the circulating fluid—arterial and venous.

The proportion of arterial blood to venous is about 4 to 9.

Much attention has been paid to the varying condition of the blood in disease. The average proportion of each of the organic elements in 1000 parts of healthy blood is as follows, according to Le Canu, and MM. Andral and Gavarret:—fibrin, 3; red corpuscles, 127; solid matter of the serum, 80; water, 790.

Dried human blood was, at one time, considered to be anti-epileptic; that of the goat, dried, Sanguis hirci sicca'tus, sudorific and antipleuretic. The dried blood of the ox—Extrac'tum San'guinis Bovi'ni—and the dried red corpuscles have been given as analeptics, especially where there was a deficiency of red corpuscles.

BLOOD-LETTING, Missio seu Detrac'tio San'guinis, Hæmax'is, Cataschas'mus, Blooding,

Bleeding, (F.) Saignée, Emission sanguine. A discharge of a certain quantity of blood produced by art: an operation which consists in making an opening into a vessel to draw or let blood from it. When practised on an artery, it is called Arteriot'omy; on a vein, Phlebot'omy, Venæsec'tio, Venesec'tion; and on the capillary vessels, local or capillary, in contradistinction to the former, which is termed general. Blood-letting is used both during the existence of a disease, as in inflammation, and in the way of prophylaxis. It is employed to fulfil various indications. 1. To diminish the actual mass of blood;—when it is termed, by the French pathologists, Saignée évacuative. In such case, fluids ought not to be allowed too freely afterwards. 2. To diminish the turgescence in any particular organ—(F.) Saignée révulsive, Revulsive blood-letting or bleeding, Venæsec'tio revulso'ria, when performed far from the part affected; and Saignée dérivative, when near. 3. To diminish the consistence of the blood, (F.) Saignée spoliative. The immediate effects of blood-letting are: diminution of the mass of blood and of heat; retardation of the pulse, and sometimes syncope. Blood-letting from the veins —phlebotomy—is practised on the subcutaneous veins of the neck, the face, the fore-arm, and the leg; sometimes on those of the hand or foot. The necessary apparatus consists of a bandage or riband, a compress of rag, and a lancet or fleam.

The veins selected for the operation, are, 1. In the fold of the arm, five;—the cephalic, basilic, the two median, and the anterior cubital. 2. In the hand, the cephalic and salvatella. 3. In the foot, the great and little saphena. 4. In the neck, the external jugular. 5. In the forehead, the frontal. 6. In the mouth, the ranine. The operation of phlebotomy in the limbs is performed by tying a circular bandage round the limb, in order that the subcutaneous veins may become turgid by the course of the blood being obstructed: the bandage not being so tight, however, as to compress the arteries of the limb. A puncture is made into the vein, and the desired quantity allowed to flow. The ligature is now removed, and a compress and retaining bandage applied. Capillary or local blood-letting, arterio-phlebot'omy, is practised on the skin or mucuous membranes, by means of leeches, the lancet, or cupping.

In the time of the plague this was done by "the chirurgeons," who were allowed "twelve pence," to be paid out of the goods of the party searched, if able; otherwise, by the parish. Until of late, this office was executed in England by two old women—called 'searchers'; and hence the imperfections of the Bills of Mortality. In plague times, the office was an important one; and, it is stated, that a noted searcher, named Snacks, finding his business increase so much, that he could not transact it alone, offered to any one who would join him in its hazards, half the profits; and they who joined him were said to "go with Snacks." Hence, the saying "to go Snacks," or to divide the spoils.—Wadd.

BONE, Os, Os'teon, Os'teum, (F.) Os, (Sax.) ban. The bones are the solid and hard parts, which form the basis of the bodies of animals of the superior classes; and the union of which constitutes the skeleton. The human body has, at the adult age, 208 bones, without including the 32 teeth, the ossa Wormiana, and the sesamoid bones. Anatomists divide them, from their shape, into 1. Long bones, which form part of the limbs, and represent columns for supporting the weight of the body, or levers of different kinds for the muscles to act upon. 2. Flat bones, which form the parietes of splanchnic cavities; and, 3. Short bones, met with in parts of the body where solidity and some mobility are necessary. Bones are formed of two different textures; spongy and compact. They afford, on analysis, much phosphate and carbonate of lime, a little phosphate of magnesia, phosphate of ammonia, oxides of iron and manganese, some traces of alumina and silica, gelatin, fat, and water. The uses of the bones are mentioned under each bone. They give shape to the body, contain and defend the viscera, and act as levers to the muscles.

BRONCHI, Bronchia.

BRON'CHIA, Bron'chiæ, Bronchi, from βρογχος, 'the throat.' The Latins used the term Bronchus for the whole of the trachea; whilst they called its ramifications Bronchia. Bronchia, Bronchiæ, and Bronchi, (F.) Bronches, now mean the two tubes, with their ramifications, which arise from the bifurcation of the trachea, and carry air into the lungs — Can'nulæ pulmo'num, Syrin'ges seu Cana'les aërif'eri.

Bronchia, Dilatation of the, Dilated Bronchia, Bronchec'tasis, Bronchiec'tasis, Dilatatio bronchio'rum. The physical signs of this condition are the following: Percussion usually clear, but not unfrequently less so than natural, although very seldom quite dull. Auscultation detects coarse mucous or gurgling rhonchi, increased by the cough, combined with, or replaced by, bronchial or cavernous respiration, which is often effected as if by a sudden puff or whiff. The resonance of the voice is increased, but it seldom amounts to perfect pectoriloquy. The most common situations for dilated bronchia are the scapular, mammary, or lateral regions. They are almost always confined to one side.

Bronchia, Obliteration or Compression of the. The inspiratory murmur on auscultation is weaker or wholly suppressed over a limited portion of the chest; the expiration is generally more distinct and prolonged: all the other conditions are natural.

BRONCHIÆ, see Bronchia.

BRON'CHIAL, Bronchic, Bronchia'lis, Bron'chicus, (F.) Bronchial, Bronchique. That which relates to the bronchia.

Their functions are unknown. The bronchial glands may be presumed to be affected by scrofulosis, when, in addition to the existence of tumours in the neck, percussion gives a dull sound under the upper and central part of the sternum, whilst there is no appreciable lesion of the lungs.

Bronchial Nerves, (F.) Nerfs bronchiques, are furnished by the two pulmonary plexuses.

This is always more or less present in cases of pulmonary catarrh; and is accompanied by cough, mucous expectoration, dyspnœa, and more or less uneasiness in breathing. The acute form is accompanied with all the signs of internal inflammation, and requires the employment of antiphlogistics followed by revulsives. The chronic form, Tussis seni'lis, Catar'rhus seni'lis, Rheuma catarrha'lè, Peripneumo'nia notha, Bronchorrhœ'a acu'ta, Winter Cough, Chronic Catarrh, may be confounded with phthisis; from which it must be distinguished mainly by the absence of hectic fever and of the physical signs that are characteristic of the latter, as well as by the nature of the expectoration, which is generally mucous, although at times muco-purulent. When the expectoration is little or none, the bronchitis is said to be dry, dry catarrh, (F.) Catarrhe Sec.

When bronchitis affects the smaller tubes, it is termed capil'lary bronchi'tis, bronchi'tis capilla'ris, bronchoc'acè infanti'lis [?], and is often fatal to children. Vesic'ular bronchitis is the term proposed by M.M. Rilliet and Barthez for the vesicular pneumonia of children.

BRUIT DE RÂPE, 'sound of a rasp.' A sound heard during the contraction of either the auricles or ventricles. It is constant; and the contraction of the cavity is more prolonged than natural, and emits a hard, rough, and—as it were - -stified sound.

It indicates contraction of the valvular orifices by cartilaginous deposits, or ossification, and is better heard near the apex of the heart, if the auriculo-ventricular valves be concerned,—near the base, if the semilunar valves be the seat of the disease.

BRUIT DE SOUFFLET, Bruit de Souffle, 'bellows' sound,' 'blowing sound.' A sound like that of a bellows, heard occasionally by the ear applied to the chest during the contraction of the ventricles, auricles, or large arteries. It coexists with affections of the heart, but is heard, also, without any disease of that organ,—whenever, indeed, an artery is compressed. An Encephalic bellows' sound, (F.) Bruit de souffle céphalique, has been described by Drs. Fisher and Whitney. It is heard on applying the ear to the occiput or to the top of the head; and is considered to indicate turgescence of vessels, or inflammation. When such turgescence exists, the vessels are compressed, and the compression gives rise to the sound in question. [?]

BRUIT DE TAFFETAS, 'sound of taffeta.' 'Sarcenet sound.' A respiratory sound. so named, by M. Grisolle, from its resembling the sound caused by the tearing of a piece of taffeta; and which he considers to indicate hepatization of the lung, limited to the surface, in pneumonia.

BRUIT TYMPANIQUE, 'tympanic sound.' The clear sound afforded by percussing the stomach and intestines when containing air.

CALCUL, Calculus.

CALCULEUX, Calculous.

CALCULI, see Calculus — c. Articular, see Calculi, arthritic; and Concretions, articular.

CALCULI, ALTERNATING, see Calculi, urinary.

CALCULI, ARTHRIT'IC, Tophi, Tuber'cula arthrit'ica, Calculi arthrit'ici seu podag'rici, Chalk-stones, Gout-stones, Nodes, (F.) Pierres crayeuses, Calculs arthritiques, Nœuds. Concretions, which form in the ligaments, and within the capsules of the joints, in persons affected with gout. They are composed of uric acid, soda, and a little animal matter; very rarely, urate of lime and chloride of sodium are met with. Similar calculi are found in other parts beside the joints.

CAL'CULI, BIL'IARY, Cal'culi bilio'si seu fell'ei seu bilia'rii, Bil'iary Concre'tions, Gall-stones, Cholol'ithus, Cholel'ithus, (F.) Calculs biliaires, Pierres au fiel, Angicholollithe,— Piorry. Some of these contain all the materials of the bile, and seem to be nothing more than that secretion thickened. Several contain Picromel; and the greater part are composed of from 88 to 94 parts of Cholesterin, and of from 6 to 12 of the yellow matter of the bile. Biliary calculi are most frequently found in the gall-bladder: at other times, in the substance of the liver, in the branches of the Ductus hepaticus, or in the Ductus Communis Choledochus. The first are called Cystic; the second Hepatic; and the last, sometimes, Hepatocystic. The causes which give rise to them are very obscure. Often they occasion no uneasiness, and at other times the symptoms may be confounded with those of hepatitis. At times, they are rejected by the mouth, or by the bowels, along with a considerable quantity of bile, which had accumulated behind them; at other times they occasion violent abdominal inflammation, abscesses, and biliary fistulæ, rupture of the gall-bladder, and fatal effusion into the peritoneum. The passage of a gall-stone is extremely painful; yet the pulse is not at first affected. Antiphlogistics, when there is inflammatory action, and strong doses of opium, to allay the pain and spasm, with the warm bath, are the chief remedies. Solvents are not to be depended upon. They cannot reach the calculi.

Calculi, Bone Earth, see Calculi, urinary—c. Compound, see Calculi, urinary—c. Cystic, see Calculi, urinary.

Cal'culi of the Ears, (F.) Calculs de l' Oreille. Hard, light, and inflammable concretions, which occur in the meatus auditorius externus, and are merely indurated cerumen. They are a frequent cause of deafness. They can be easily seen, and may be extracted by appropriate forceps, after having been detached by injections of soap and water.

Calculi Fellei, Calculi, biliary — c. Fusible, see Calculi, urinary.

Cal'culi, Lach'rymal, (F.) Calculs lacrymaux. Concretions sometimes, but rarely, form in the lachrymal passages, where they occasion abscesses and fistulæ, which do not heal until they are extracted. No analysis has been made of them.

Calculi, Lithic, see Calculi, urinary.

Cal'culi of the Mammæ, (F.) Calculs des Mamelles. Haller gives a case of a concretion, of a yellowish-white colour, which had the shape of one of the excretory ducts of the mammary gland, having been extracted from an abscess seated in that organ.

Calculi, Mulberry, see Calculi, urinary.

Cal'culi of the Pan'creas, (F.) Calculs du Pancréas. These are but little known. Analogy has induced a belief that they resemble the salivary. Some have supposed that certain transparent calculi, rejected by vomiting, or passed in the evacuations, have proceeded from the pancreas, but there seems to be no reason for this belief.

Cal'culi of the Pine'al Gland, (F.) Calculs de la Glande Pinéale. These have been frequently met with. No symptom announces their presence during life. They are composed of phosphate of lime.

Calculi Podagrici, Calculi, arthritic.

Cal'culi of the Prostate, Prostat'ic cal'culi. These are not very rare. They have generally the same composition as the preceding. They usually present the symptoms common to every tumefaction of the prostate, and sometimes those of calculi in the bladder.

Cal'culi Pul'monary, (F.) Calculs pulmonaires. These concretions are very frequently met with in the dead body, without seeming to have produced unpleasant symptoms during life. At other times, they are accompanied with all the symptoms of phthisis, Litho-phthisis, Phthisie calculeuse, of Bayle. See Lithiasis pulmonum. At times they are expectorated without the supervention of any unpleasant symptom. They are usually formed of carbonate of lime and animal matter.

Cal'culi, Sal'ivary, Cal'culi saliva'les, Sialol'ithi, (F.) Calculs salivaires. Concretions, usually formed of phosphate of lime and animal matter, which are developed in the substance of the salivary glands or in their excretory ducts. In the first case, they may be mistaken for a simple swelling of the gland; in the second, they may generally be detected by the touch. They may be extracted by incision in the interior of the mouth. The calculus developed in the sublingual ducts has been called Cal'culus sublingua'lis and Ran'ula lapide'a.

Cal'culi, Spermat'ic, (F.) Calculs spermatiques. These have been sometimes found in the vesiculæ seminales after death. They cannot be detected during life. No analysis has been made of them.

Cal'culi of the Stomach and Intes'tines, Enterol'ithus, E. Cal'culus, Coprol'ithus, Concretio'nes alvi'næ, (F.) Calculs de l'estomac, C. intestinaux ou stercoraux, Pierres stercorales, Concrétions intestinales. Calculi of the stomach are rare, and have almost always been carried thither by the antiperistaltic action of the intestines. The symptoms occasioned by them are those of chronic gastritis. It has been imagined that the continued use of absorbent powders, as magnesia, will give occasion to them.

Intestinal concretions, (F.) Calculs intestinaux, are not uncommon in animals (see Bezoard:) but they are rare in man. The causes which give rise to them are little known: sometimes a biliary calculus affords them a nucleus. Their composition varies. They are light, hard, very fetid, and not inflammable. They are formed, ordinarily, between the valvulæ of the small intestines, or in the cells of the large, and sometimes in old herniæ. Whilst they do not obstruct the passage of the alimentary mass, they produce no unpleasant symptoms. At times, the movable tumour which they form may be felt through the parietes of the abdomen. They are generally evacuated per anum.

Cal'culi of the Tonsils. Calculous concretions, which sometimes form in the tonsils. (F.) Calculs des Amygdales. They are easily recognised by the sight and touch: sometimes they are discharged by spitting, either alone or with the pus of an abscess occasioned by their presence. They have not been analyzed.

Calculi, Triple, see Calculi, urinary — c. Uric, see Calculi, urinary.

Cal'culi, U'rinary, Urol'ithi, (F.) Calculs urinaires, Pierres urinaires. Concretions which form from the crystallizable substances in the urine, and which are met with not only in the whole course of the urinary passages, but in fistulous openings wherever the urine stagnates naturally or accidentally. Their causes are but little known. They are more common at the two extremities of life than at the middle, and more so in some countries and districts than in others. At times, a clot of blood, a portion of mucus, &c., form the nucleus. The symptoms and treatment vary according to the seat of the calculus. There is no such thing probably as a medical solvent. See Urinary Calculi.

Chymists have demonstrated the existence of several components of urinary calculi, viz., Lithic Acid, Phosphate of Lime, Ammoniaco-Magnesian Phosphate, Oxalate of Lime, Cystic Oxide, and Xanthic Oxide, with an animal cementing ingredient. The varieties of calculi, produced by the combination or intermixture of these ingredients, are thus represented by Dr. Paris.

A TABULAR VIEW OF DIFFERENT SPECIES OF URINARY CALCULI.

SPECIES OF CALCULI.	EXTERNAL CHARACTERS.	CHYMICAL COMPOSITION.	REMARKS.
1. LITHIC OR LRIC.	FORM, a flattened oval. S. G. generally exceeds 1.500. Colour, brownish or fawn-like. Surface, smooth. Texture, laminated.	It consists principally of Lithic Acid. When treated with nitric acid, a beautiful pink substance results. This calculus is slightly soluble in water, abundantly so in the pure alkalies.	It is the prevailing species; but the surface sometimes occurs fine ly tuberculated. It frequently constitutes the nuclei of the other species.
2. MULBERRY, (F.) Calculs muraux.	Colour, dark brown. Texture, harder than that of the other species. S. G. from 1.428 to 1.976. Surface, studded with tubercles.	It is oxalate of lime, and is decomposed in the flame of a spirit lamp swelling out into a white efflorescence, which is quicklime.	This species includes some varieties, which are remarkably smooth and pale-coloured, resembling hempseed.
3. BONE EARTH	Colour, pale brown or gray; surface, smooth and polished; structure, regularly laminated; the laminæ easily separating into concrete crusts.	Principally phosphate of lime. It is soluble in muriatic acid.
4. TRIPLE.	Colour, generally brilliant white. Surface, uneven, studded with shining crystals, less compact than the preceding species. Between its laminæ small cells occur, filled with sparkling particles.	It is an ammoniaco-magnesian phosphate, generally mixed with phosphate of lime. Pure alkalies decompose it, extracting its ammonia.	This species attains a larger size than any of the others.
5. FUSIBLE.	Colour, grayish white.	A compound of the two foregoing species.	It is very fusible, melting into a vitreous globule.
6. CYSTIC.	Very like the triple calculus, but it is unstratified and more compact and homogenous.	It consists of cystic oxide. Under the blowpipe it yields a peculiarly fetid odour. It is soluble in acids, and in alkalies, even if they are fully saturated with carbonic acid.	It is a rare species.
7. ALTERNATING.	Its section exhibits different concentric laminæ.	Compounded of several species, alternating with each other.
8. COMPOUND.	No characteristic form.	The ingredients are separable only by chymical analysis.

1. Renal Calculi, (F.) Calculs rénaux. These have almost always a very irregular shape: at times, there is no indication of their presence: at others, they occasion attacks of pain in the kidneys, sometimes accompanied with bloody or turbid urine. Often, they cause inflammation of the kidneys, with all its unpleasant results. They are generally formed of uric acid, animal matter, and oxalate of lime, with, sometimes, phosphates. The treatment will have to vary, according to the absence or presence of inflammatory signs,—relieving the irritation by opiates. A surgical operation can rarely be applicable.

2. Calculi of the Ureters, (F.) Calculs des Urétères. These come from the kidneys, and do not produce unpleasant effects, unless they are so large as to obstruct the course of the urine, and to occasion distension of the whole of the ureters above them; or unless their surface is so rough as to irritate the mucous membrane, and occasion pain, hemorrhage, abscesses, &c. The pain, during the passage, is very violent, extending, at times, to the testicle of the same side in the male; and occasioning a numbness of the thigh in both sexes. The treatment consists in general or local blood-letting, warm bath, and opiates.

3. Calculi, Vesical; Stone in the Bladder, Lith'ia Vesica'lis. Lithi'asis cys'tica seu vesica'lis, Cysto-lithi'asis, Dysu'ria calculo'sa seu irrita'ta, Cal'culus vesi'cæ, (F.) Calculs vésicaux. These are the most common. Sometimes, they proceed from the kidneys: most commonly, they are formed in the bladder itself. Sense of weight in the perinæum, and sometimes of a body rolling when the patient changes his position; pain or itching at the extremity of the glans in men; frequent desire to pass the urine; sudden stoppage to its flow; and bloody urine—are the chief signs which induce a suspicion of their existence. We cannot, however, be certain of this without sounding the patient. Sometimes, when of a small size, they are expelled: most commonly, they remain in the bladder, the disorganization of which they occasion, unless removed by a surgical operation.

4. Calculi, Ure'thral. These almost always proceed from the bladder. The obstruction, which they cause to the passage of the urine, the hard tumour, and the noise occasioned when struck by a sound, indicate their presence. They are removed by incision.

5. Calculi of Fis'tulous passages. These arise when there is some fistulous opening into the urethra. They can be readily recognised, and may generally be extracted with facility. (F.) Calculs placés hors des voies urinaires. See Urinary Calculi.

CAL'CULI OF THE U'TERUS, (F.) Calculs de l'Utérus. These are very rare. The signs, which indicate them during life, are those of chronic engorgement of the uterus. Their existence, consequently, cannot be proved till after death.

CALCULIFRAGUS, Lithontriptic.

CAL'CULOUS, (F.) Calculeux, Graveleux. That which relates to calculi, especially to those of the bladder.

CALCULOUS OXYD, Oxyd, cystic.

CALCULS (F.), pl. of Calcul, a calculus.

CAL'CULUS, Lapis, Lithos. A diminutive of calx, a lime-stone. (F.) Calcul, Pierre. Calculi are concretions, which may form in every part of the animal body, but are most frequently found in the organs that act as reservoirs, and in the excretory canals. They are met with in the tonsils, joints, biliary ducts, digestive passages, lachrymal ducts, mammæ, pancreas, pineal gland, prostate, lungs, salivary, spermatic and urinary passages, and in the uterus. The causes which give rise to them are obscure.

Those that occur in reservoirs or ducts are supposed to be owing to the deposition of the substances, which compose them, from the fluid as it passes along the duct; and those which occur in the substance of an organ are regarded as the product of some chronic irritation. Their general effect is to irritate, as extraneous bodies, the parts with which they are in contact; and to produce retention of the fluid, whence they have been formed. The symptoms differ, according to the sensibility of the organ and the importance of the particular secretion whose discharge they impede. Their solution is generally impracticable: spontaneous expulsion or extraction is the only way of getting rid of them.

CANALS OF HAVERS, Canals, nutritive—c. Haversian, Canals, nutritive.

Canals, Nutritive, Canals for the nutrition of bones, Ductus nutrit''ii, Canalic'uli vasculo'si seu Haversia'ni, Haver'sian Canals, Canals of Havers, (F.) Canaux nourriciers ou du Nutrition des os, Conduits nourriciers ou nutriciers. The canals through which the vessels pass to the bones. They are lined by a very fine lamina of compact texture, or are formed in the texture itself. There is, generally, one large nutritious canal in a long bone, situate towards its middle.

CANAPACIA, Artemisia vulgaris.

CANARIES, CLIMATE OF. The climate of the Canaries greatly resembles that of Madeira. That of the latter, however, is more equable, and the accommodation for invalids much superior.

CANAUX VEINEUX, Venous Canals. The canals situate in the diploë, which convey venous blood.

CAN'CAMUM. A mixture of several gums and resins, exported from Africa, where it is used to deterge wounds. Dioscorides calls, by the name καγκαμον, the tears from an Arabian tree, which are similar to myrrh, and of a disagreeable taste. He advises it in numerous diseases. This name is given, also, to the Anime.

CANCAMY, Anime.

CAN'CELLATED, Cancella'tus, (F.) Cancellé; from Cancelli, 'lattice-work.' Formed of cancelli, as the 'cancellated structure of bone.'

CANCEL'LI, 'Lattice-work.' The Cellular or Spongy Texture of Bones, (F.) Tissu cellulaire; consisting of numerous cells, communicating with each other. They contain a fatty matter, analogous to marrow. This texture is met with, principally, at the extremities of long bones; and some of the short bones consist almost wholly of it. It allows of the expansion of the extremities of bones, without adding to their weight, and deadens concussions.

CANCEL'LUS, from cancer, 'a crab.' A species of crayfish, called the Wrong Heir, and Bernard the Hermit: which is said to cure rheumatism, if rubbed on the part.

CANCER, 'a crab.' Car'cinos, Lupus cancro'sus. A disease, so called either on account of the hideous appearance which the ulcerated cancer presents, or on account of the great veins which surround it, and which the ancients compared to the claws of the crab: called also Carcino'ma. It consists of a scirrhous, livid tumour, intersected by firm, whitish, divergent bands; and occurs chiefly in the secernent glands. The pains are acute and lancinating, and often extend to other parts. The tumour, ultimately, terminates in a fetid and ichorous ulcer,—Ulcus cancro'sum. It is distinguished, according to its stages, into occult, Cancer occul'tus, and open, C. aper'tus; the former being the scirrhous, the latter the ulcerated condition. At times, there is a simple destruction or erosion of the organ, at others, an encephaloid or cerebriform, and, at others, again, a colloid degeneration.

For its production, it requires a peculiar diathesis, or cachexia. The following table, from Dr. Walshe, exhibits the characters of the three species of carcinoma:

The use of irritants in cancerous affections is strongly to be deprecated. When the disease is so situate that excision can be practised, and the constitution does not exhibit great contamination, the sooner it is removed the better.

Encephaloid.	Scirrhus.	Colloid.
Resembles lobulated cerebral matter.	Resembles rind of bacon traversed by cellulo-fibrous septa.	Has the appearance of particles of jelly inlaid in a regular alveolar bed.
Is commonly opake from its earliest formation.	Has a semi-transparent glossiness.	The contained matter is strikingly transparent.
Is of a dead white colour.	Has a clear whitish or bluish yellow tint.	Greenish yellow is its predominant hue.
Contains a multitude of minute vessels.	Is comparatively ill-supplied with vessels.	Its vessels have not been sufficiently examined as yet.
Is less hard and dense than scirrhus.	Is exceedingly firm and dense.	The jelly-like matter is exceedingly soft; a colloid mass is, however, firm and resisting.
Is frequently found in the veins issuing from the diseased mass.	Has not been distinctly detected in this situation.	The pultaceous variety has been detected in the veins.
The predominant microscopical elements are globular, not always distinctly cellular, and caudate corpuscula.	The main microscopical constituents are juxtaposed nuclear cells; caudate corpuscula do not exist in it.	Is composed of shells in a state of emboîtement.
Occasionally attains an enormous bulk.	Rarely acquires larger dimensions than an orange.	Observes a mean in this respect.
Has been observed in almost every tissue of the body.	Its seat, as ascertained by observation, is somewhat more limited.	Has so far been seen in a limited number of parts only.
Very commonly co-exists in several parts or organs of the same subject.	Is not unusually solitary.	Has rarely been met with in more than one organ.
Is remarkable for its occasional vast rapidity of growth.	Ordinarily grows slowly.	Grows with a medium degree of rapidity.
Is frequently the seat of interstitial hemorrhage and deposition of black or bistre-coloured matter.	Is comparatively rarely the seat of these changes.
When softened into a pulp, appears as a dead white or pink opake matter of creamy consistence.	Resembles, when softened, a yellowish brown semitransparent gelatinous matter.	Undergoes no visible change of the kind.
Subcutaneous tumours are slow to contract adhesion with the skin.	Scirrhus thus situate usually becomes adherent.
Ulcerated encephaloid is frequently the seat of hemorrhage, followed by rapid fungous development.	Scirrhous ulcers much less frequently give rise to hemorrhage; and fungous growths (provided they retain the scirrhous character) are now more slowly and less abundantly developed.
The progress of the disease after ulceration is commonly very rapid.	There is not such a remarkable change in the rate of progress of the disease after ulceration has set in.
It is the most common form under which secondary cancer exhibits itself
Is the species of cancer most frequently observed in young subjects.	Is much less common before puberty.	Has so far been observed in adults only.

It is, however, rare in the last-named country. It is found in species of Oleaceæ — as the ash, privet, and lilac; and of Caprifoliaceæ — as the elder and lonicera. It is much employed in medicine, and is the most common vesicatory. Given internally, and even when absorbed from the skin, it affects the urinary organs, exciting strangury. This may be prevented, in cases of blisters, by interposing between the blistering plaster and skin a piece of tissue-paper. Diluents relieve the strangury. Dose, half a grain to one grain. If kept dry, the flies will retain their activity for many years. Their active principle — Can'tharidin, Cantharidi'na — has been separated from them.

Cantharis vesicatoria is the ordinary blistering insect used in Europe.

The seat of the disease is evidently in the cerebro-spinal axis, primarily or secondarily: generally, perhaps, it is owing to erethism seated elsewhere, but communicated to the cerebro-spinal centre, and reflected to the respiratory and other muscles concerned. It seems to be connected with dental irritation; and consequently, in the treatment, where such is the case, the gums should be freely divided; after which, cathartics and revulsives, with the use of narcotics and appropriate diet, will generally remove the affection; for although extremely alarming, it is often not attended with great danger. A deprivation of sight, which comes on as if a veil fell before the eyes. Cataract consists in opacity of the crystalline lens or its capsule, which prevents the passage of the rays of light, and precludes vision. The causes are obscure. Diagnosis. — The patient is blind, the pupil seems closed by an opake body, of variable colour, but commonly whitish: — the pupil contracting and dilating. Cataracts have been divided, by some, into spurious and genuine. The former, where the obstacle to vision is between the capsule of the lens and the uvea: the latter, where it is in the lens or capsule. A lenticular cataract is where the affection is seated in the lens;—a capsular or membranous, in the capsule. The capsular is divided again, by Beer, into the anterior, posterior, and complete capsular cataract. When the capsule is rendered opake, in consequence of an injury, which cuts or ruptures any part of it, it thickens, becomes leathery, and has been called Cataract'a arida siliquo'sa. Catarac'ta Morgagnia'na lactea seu purifor'mis is the milky variety, in which the crystalline is transformed into a liquid similar to milk, (F.) Cataracte laiteuse; or, as generally defined, in which there is opacity of the fluid situate between the lens and its capsule. The cap'sulo-lentic'ular affects both lens and capsule, (Ackrystallodiaphanie, Adiaphanie périchrystaltique—Piorry,) and Beer conceives the liquor Morgagni, in an altered state, may contribute to it. Cataracts are also called hard, soft (Phacomala'cia,), stony, (F. pierreuse,) milky or cheesy (laiteuse ou caséuse,), Galactocatarac'ta, Catarac'ta lactic'olor, according to their density: — white, pearly, yellow, brown, gray, green, black, (F.) blanche, perlée, jaune, brune, grise, verte, noire, according to their colour: — fixed or vacillating — catarac'ta capsulo-lenticula'ris fixa vel trem'ula, (F.) fixe ou branlante, according as they are fixed or movable behind the pupil. They are likewise called Catarac'tæ marmora'ciæ, fenestra'tæ, stella'tæ, punctu'tæ, dimidia'tæ, &c., according to the appearances they present.

They may be simple, or complicated with adhesion, amaurosis, specks, &c.; and primary or primitive, when opake before the operation;—secondary, when the opacity is the result of the operation.

- Sanguineous.
- Pigmentous.

Cataract is commonly a disease of elderly individuals, although, not unfrequently, congen'ital. It forms slowly; objects are at first seen as through a mist; light bodies appear to fly before the eyes, and it is not until after months or years that the sight is wholly lost. No means will obviate the evil except an operation, which consists in removing the obstacle to the passage of the light to the retina. Four chief methods are employed for this purpose. 1. Couching or Depression, Hyaloniz'is, Hyalonyx'is, (F.) Abaissement, Déplacement de la Cataracte. This consists in passing a cataract needle through the sclerotica and subjacent membranes, a little above the transverse diameter of the eye; and at about two lines' distance from the circumference of the transparent cornea, until the point arrives in the posterior chamber of the eye. With this the crystalline is depressed to the outer and lower part of the globe of the eye, where it is left. 2. By absorption, — by the French termed broiement or bruising. This is performed in the same manner as the former; except that, instead of turning the crystalline from the axis of the visual rays, it is divided by the cutting edge of the needle, and its fragments are scattered in the humours of the eye, where they are absorbed. 3. By extraction, which consists in opening, with a particular kind of knife, the transparent cornea and the anterior portion of the capsule of the crystalline; and causing the lens to issue through the aperture. Each of the processes has its advantages and disadvantages, and all are used by surgeons. 4. Some, again, pass a cataract needle through the transparent cornea and pupil to the crystalline, and depress or cause its absorption. This is called Ceratonyxis. See, also, Reclination.

CAUTERIZA'TION, Cauterisa'tio, Cauterias'mus, Exus'tio, Inus'tio, Caus'tica Adus'tio. Firing. The effect of a cautery or caustic. The French, amongst whom cauterization is much used, distinguished five kinds: 1. Cautérisation Inhérente, which consists in applying the actual cautery freely, and with a certain degree of force, so as to disorganize deeply. 2. Cautérisation transcurrente, which consists in passing the edge of the Cautère cultellaire, or the point of the Cautère conique lightly, so as not to disorganize deeply. 3. Cautérisation par pointes, which consists in applying on the skin, here and there, the hot point of the conical cautery, with sufficient force to cauterize the whole thickness of the skin. 4. Cautérisation lente, slow cauterization, by means of the moxa. 5. Cautérisation objective, which consists in holding the cautery at some distance from the part to be acted upon by it.

CAU'TERIZE; Caustico adurere; (F.) Cautériser. To apply a cautery or caustic. To burn with a cautery or caustic.

The vena cava supe'rior, thorac'ica seu descen'dens, is formed by the union of the subclavians; and receives successively, before its termination at the upper part of the right auricle, the inferior thyroid, right internal mammary, superior diaphragmatic, azygos, &c. The vena cava infe'rior, abdomina'lis seu ascen'dens, arises from the union of the two primary iliacs, opposite the fourth or fifth lumbar vertebra, receives the middle sacral, lumbar, right spermatic, hepatic, and inferior diaphragmatics, and opens at the posterior and inferior part of the right auricle.

CAVERNOUS BODIES, Cor'pora Cavernos'a of the penis, Cor'pora nervo'sa seu Ner'veo-spongio'sa Penis, (F.) Corps Caverneux. The corpus cavernosum is a kind of cylindrical sac, composed of cells; separated, through its whole extent, by a vertical, incomplete septum, Septum pectinifor'mē, Trabec'ulæ cor'porum cavernoso'rum, and forming nearly two-thirds of the penis. The corpus cavernosum, on each side, arises from the ascending portion of the ischium, and terminates obtusely behind the glans. The arteries of the corpora cavernosa come from the internal pudic. See Helicine Arteries. Nerves are found on the surface of the outer membrane, but they do not appear to penetrate the substance, and the smooth muscular fibre has been traced into the fibrous parietes of the cells, as in the case of all erectile tissues.

J. Müller's researches have led him to infer, that both in man and the horse, the nerves of the corpora cavernosa are made up of branches proceeding from the organic as well as the animal system, whilst the nerves of animal life alone provide the nerves of sensation of the penis.

CAVERNOUS BODIES, Corpora Cavernosa of the Clit'oris, are two hollow crura, forming the clitoris.

CAVERNOUS BODY OF THE VAGI'NA, Corpus Caverno'sum Vagi'næ, Plexus retiform'is, is a sub stance composed of blood-vessels and cells, similar to those of the penis and clitoris, which covers the outer extremity of the vagina, on each side. It serves to contract the entrance to the vagina during coition.

CAVERNOUS GANGLION, see Carotid or Carotic Nerve.

CAVERNOUS RESPIRA'TION. When a cavity exists in the lungs, and one or more ramifications of the bronchia terminate in it, a loud tubal noise is emitted, provided the cavity be not filled with fluid, which is called cavernous respiration. In this condition, the cough is cavernous likewise, (F.) Toux Caverneuse. When the capacity of the cavern is very great, the sound of the respiration is like that produced by blowing into a decanter, with the mouth at a little distance from the neck. This kind of cavernous respiration has been called amphoric, from amphora, 'a flask;' (F.) Respiration amphorique, Souffle amphorique, S. métallique.

The Veiled Puff, (F.) Souffle voilé, is a modification of the cavernous respiration, in which, according to Laënnec, "a sort of movable veil interposed between the excavation and the ear" seems to be agitated to and fro. It is a sign which is not attended to.

Cavernous Sinus, Sinus Caverno'sus seu polymor'phus seu sphenoida'lis, Receptac'ulum sellæ equi'næ lat'eribus appos'itum, (F.) Sinus caverneux. The Cav'ernous Si'nuses are venous cavities of the dura mater, filled with a multitude of reddish, soft filaments, intersecting each other; and, as it were, reticulated. They commence behind the inner part of the sphenoid fissure, pass backwards on the sides of the fossa pituitaria, and terminate by opening into a cavity, common to the superior and inferior petrosal sinuses. They receive some meningeal veins, the ophthalmic veins, &c. The anterior extremity of each cavernous sinus has been named the ophthal'mic sinus.

Cavernous Texture or Tissue, Tela caverno'sa, (F.) Tissu caverneux. The spongy substance which forms the greater part of the penis and clitoris. It seems to consist of a very complicated lace-work of arteries and veins; and, probably, of nervous filaments, with small fibrous plates, which form by their decussation numerous cells communicating with each other. This spongy texture produces erection, by dilating and swelling on the influx of blood; and probably, also, by virtue of some property inherent in it.

CEREBRAL APOPHYSIS, Pineal gland.

CEREBRAL AR'TERIES are three on each side: —the anterior or artery of the corpus callosum, and the middle, arte'ria Sylvia'na, are furnished by the internal carotid: —the posterior or posterior and inferior artery of the brain, A. profunda cerebri, arises from the vertebral. Chaussier calls these arteries lobaires, because they correspond with the anterior, middle, and posterior lobes, whilst he calls the trunks, whence they originate, cerebral.

CEREBRAL NERVES are those which arise within the cranium, (F.) Nerfs craniens, all of which, perhaps, with the exception of the olfactory, originate from the medulla oblongata. See Nerves.

In Pathology, an affection is called cerebral, which specially occupies the brain. Fièvre cérébrale, Cerebral fever, is a variety in which the head is much affected.

CER'EBRUM or CERE'BRUM, from καρα, 'the head.' The brain. (F.) Cerveau, Cervelle. This term is sometimes applied to the whole of the contents of the cranium: at others, to the upper portion;—the posterior and inferior being called cerebellum. The brain, properly so called, extends from the os frontis to the superior occipital fossæ. Anteriorly, it rests on the orbitar vault: behind this, on the middle fossæ of the base of the cranium; and, posteriorly, on the tentorium cerebello superextensum. The upper surface is divided by a deep median cleft (Scissure interlobaire, — Ch.) into two halves, called hemispheres, which are united at the base by the corpus callosum. At its surface are numerous convolutions. The inferior surface exhibits, from before to behind, three lobes, distinguished into anterior, middle, and posterior. The middle is separated from the anterior by the fissure of SYLVIUS; and from the posterior, by a shallow furrow which corresponds to the upper portion of the pars petrosa. Internally, the brain has, on the median line, the corpus callosum, septum lucidum, fornix, pineal gland, and third ventricle: — and laterally, the lateral ventricles, in which are the corpora striata, optic thalami, &c. It is contained in a triple envelope, (see Meninges.) Its texture is pulpy, and varies according to age. Two substances may be distinguished in it — the white, medullary, tubular or fibrous — medull'a cer'ebri, (F.) Pulpe cérébral, and the cortical, cineritious, vesicular, or gray. The former is white; and occupies all the interior and base of the brain. The latter is grayish and softer. It is situate particularly at the surface of the organ.

The brain receives several arterial vessels, furnished by the internal carotid and vertebral. Its veins end in the sinuses. It is the material organ of the mental and moral manifestations. According to Gall, each part is the special seat of one of those faculties, and the brain and cerebellum, inclusive, are called by him 'the nervous system of the mental faculties.' See Craniology.

The substance of the nervous system—Neurine —has been analyzed by Vauquelin, and found to contain water, 80·00; white fatty matter, 4·53; red fatty matter, called cerebrine, 0·70; osmazome, 1·12; albumen, 7·00; phosphorus, 1·50; sulphur, acid phosphates of potassa, lime, and magnesia, 5·15.

A cutaneous affection, characterized by one or more broad, irregular-shaped patches, of a yellow or yellowish-brown colour, occurring most frequently on the front of the neck, breast, abdomen, and groins. The patches do not generally rise above the surface. There is usually some degree of itching. A cryptogamous growth has been found in it, to which M. Robin gives the name Microsporon furfur.

The causes are not very evident. Sulphur externally — in any and every form — generally removes it speedily. Should there be difficulty, the external use of the remedy in baths or fumigations may succeed.

CHLORINE, from χλωρος, 'green.' Chlo'rinum, Chlorin'ium, Chlora, Oxymuriat'ic Acid Gas, Oxygena'ted Muriatic Acid Gas, Dephlogisticated Marine Acid, Hal'ogene, Mu'rigene, Chlorum, (F.) Chlore. So far as we know, this is an elementary substance. It is a greenish, yellow gas, of a strong suffocating smell, and disagreeable taste: incapable of maintaining combustion and respiration, and very soluble in water. One of its characteristics is, that of destroying, almost immediately, all vegetable and animal colours. It is employed in fumigations as a powerful disinfecting agent. A very dilute solution, Aqua seu Liquor Chlo'rini, Chlorin'ii Liquor (Ph. D.), Chlorin'ei aqua (Ph. E.), Chlorine water, (F.) Chlore liquide, has been administered internally, in certain cases of diarrhœa and chronic dysentery. Immersion of the hands and arms in it has often removed itch and other cutaneous affections. It has also been inhaled in a dilute state in the early stage of phthisis, but it is of doubtful efficacy, and is better adapted for chronic bronchitis.

CHLORINE, BISULPHURET OF, Sulphur, chloride of.

CHLORO-ANÉMIE, Chlorosis.

CHLO'ROFORM, Chloroform'um, Chloroform'ium, Carbo'neum chlora'tum, Superchlo'ridum formyl'icum, Perchloride and Terchloride of Formyl, Chloroform'yl, called also, but not correctly, Terchloride of Carbon, and Chloric ether, Æther chlo'ricus; — (F.) Chloroforme, Chloréthéride, so called on account of the connexion of chlorine with formic acid, is a colourless, oleaginous liquid, of a sweetish ethereal odour, hot, aromatic, and peculiar taste. The specific gravity of that of the Ph. U. S. is 1.49. It may be obtained by distilling from a mixture of chlorinated lime and alcohol, — rectifying the product by redistillation, first from a great excess of chlorinated lime, and afterwards from strong sulphuric acid. It has been used with advantage in asthma, and in diseases in which a grateful soothing agent is required. Dose fʒss to fʒj, diluted with water. It has likewise been prescribed with great success as an anæsthetic agent in spasmodic diseases; and to obtund sensibility in surgical operations and in parturition, — especially in the way of inhalation; but its use requires caution. See Anæsthetic.

It is characterized by a pale, lurid complexion, languor, listlessness, depraved appetite and digestion, palpitation, &c. The disease generally goes off on the occurrence of the menstrual flux; but sometimes it is long before this is established, and, at times, the catamenia are in much larger quantity than usual. To this last form M. Trousseau has given the name chlorose hémorrhagique.

The blood of chlorosis is generally thin, light-coloured and deficient in red corpuscles; and, according to Piorry, in iron, — achalybhémie; and the clot is in less proportion to the serum than in health. On auscultation, a bellows' sound has been almost invariably detected over the heart, and a continuous blowing sound in the larger arteries, (especially the carotids and subclavians,) re-enforced by each systole of the ventricle, and resembling the buzzing of a humming-top, the cooing of doves, the whistling of air through a key-hole, &c., (see Bruit.) Very similar sounds are heard in the arteries after copious hemorrhage: they seem, therefore, to coincide with enfeebled circulation.

Tonics — as iron — are usually required in the treatment, — the disease most commonly occurring in those in whom there is considerable torpor of the system.

CHOC'OLATE, Chocola'tum, Chocola'ta, Succola'ta, Succocolla'ta. Dr. Alston says, that this word is compounded from two East Indian words: — choco, 'sound,' and atte, 'water,' because of the noise made in its preparation [?]. An alimentary paste prepared from the kernels of Theobro'ma cacao or Cacao, with sugar, and often aromatics. (See Cacao.) The chocolate thus simply prepared — as it is met with, indeed, in commerce — is called in France, Chocolat de santé, Chocola'ta simplex seu Salu'tis. It is not very easy of digestion.

In temperate climates, common cholera is not usually a disease of much consequence. It requires that the stomach and bowels should be cleared, and afterwards the irritation be allayed by full doses of opium. In malignant cholera, large doses of calomel, with opiates, form the great reliance of many practitioners. In the worst forms, however, it runs its course, unmodified by treatment.

CHOL'ERA INFAN'TUM, Chol'eric Fever of Infants; Cholera of Infants. A disease so termed by American physicians. It occurs, generally, in the middle states of the Union, in June or July, and continues during the hot weather, hence called the 'summer complaint.' The chief symptoms are vomiting, purging of green or yellow matter, slime or blood, attended with pain or uneasiness; and swelling of the abdomen, with some pyrexia, generally. The heat of the weather seems to be the predisposing, if not the exciting, cause. It is a fatal disease in towns; differing little, if at all, from what is vulgarly called the Watery Gripes in England. Clearing, gently, the alimentary canal, so as to remove the offending matter, and then exhibiting chalk mixture and laudanum, with counter-irritants, as sinapisms to the abdomen, is the most satisfactory plan of treatment.

GUY. The characteristics are:—irregular and involuntary motions of one or more limbs, and of the face and trunk. It is a disease which usually occurs before puberty; and is generally connected with torpor of the system, and of the digestive organs in particular. Its duration is long, but it is usually devoid of danger; although frequently but little under the control of medicine. The spasms do not continue during sleep. The indications of treatment are: to strengthen the general system, and stimulate the intestinal canal. Purgatives, once or twice a week, and chalybeates, with appropriate regimen, will fulfil these.

CHO'RION, χοριον, 'skin,' from χωρειν, 'to contain,' include; [?] Camis'ia Fœtûs: the chemise or shirt of the fœtus in utero. A thin, transparent membrane, formerly confounded with the decidua, which surrounds the fœtus in utero on every side, and appears to be developed from nucleated cells formed in the Fallopian tube. Some histologists, however, consider, that it exists in the ovary. The general opinion is, that it is formed as above described; and perhaps, also, from the zona pellucida, which disappears in the tube. In the uterus, villous prolongations are formed on its surface, which have given it, with more recent writers, the name 'shaggy chorion.' These villi are probably the agents of the absorption of nutritive matter furnished from the lining membrane of the uterus.

By many anatomists, the chorion is considered to be formed of two layers; the outer, called by Burdach Exocho'rion: the inner, Endocho'rion. By others, the distinction of laminæ is denied. It is exterior to the amnion.

CHORION also means the true skin. See CUTIS. By some, the Zona pellucida is so called.

It is situate between the sclerotica and retina, has an opening, posteriorly, for the passage of the optic nerve; and terminates, anteriorly, at the great circumference of the iris, where it is continuous with the ciliary processes. According to Ruysch, the choroid consists of two layers, to the innermost of which his son gave the name Tu'nica seu Membra'na Ruyschia'na, M. chorio-capilla'ris, (F.) Membrane Ruyschienne. The internal surface of the membrane is covered with a dark pigment, consisting of several layers of pigment cells, called Pigmen'tum nigrum, Stratum pigmen'ti, Ophthalmochroï'tes, Æthiops animal, Mélaïne, Mélanine, Matière ou Principe de la Mélanose, (F.) Enduit choroïdien. It is of a whitish appearance; and is formed from the chyme in the duodenum, and the rest of the small intestines, by the chyliferous vessels, which arise at the mucous surface of the intestine. Along these it passes through the mesenteric glands to the thoracic duct, and is finally poured into the left subclavian. It is composed, like the blood, of a fluid —liquor chyli—and of Chyle corpuscles or globules, the average size of which is about 1-4600th of an inch. See Chyme.

(F.) Chimie ou Chymie. A branch of the natural sciences, whose object is to investigate the nature and properties of bodies, simple and compound, inorganic and organized; and to study the force or power, by virtue of which every combination is effected. It investigates the action between the integrant molecules or atoms of bodies.

Organ'ic Chemistry, Chymi'a organ'ica, Organochemi'a, is the chymistry of organized substances, —animal and vegetable. Animal Chym'istry, Zoöch'emy or Zoöch'ymy, Zoochemi'a, is the chymistry of substances afforded by the dead or living animal body. This branch of chymistry has been farther subdivided into physiological, when it considers the changes produced in organized bodies in health,—pathological, when it regards those produced by organic or other diseases. Anthropoch'ymy, Anthropochemi'a, is the chymistry of the human body. Chymistry is called Therapeu'tical or Pharmaceu'tical, Pharmaco-chymi'a, Chymi'a pharmaceu'tica, when it is engaged in the analysis of simple medicines; in improving the prescribing and preparing of chemical and Galenical medicines; in the means of preparing them, and detecting adulterations, &c. Hygien'ic Chym'istry is that which is applied to the means of rendering habitations healthy, of analyzing the air we breathe, preventing the occurrence of disease, pointing out healthy aliments, and appreciating the influence of professions, &c., on the health of man. All these different subdivisions, with vegetable chymistry, are, at times, included under the head of Medical Chym'istry, Phytochymistry; at others, the term comprehends only the Animal, Vegetable and Pharmaceutical subdivisions. Vital Chemistry, Biochymi'a, is that which is exerted under the influence of vitality. Histoch'ymy, Histochemi'a, Histo-chem'istry, is the chemistry of the tissues, and Phlegmatoch'emy, that of the animal humours, (Lehmann).

A knowledge of chemistry is of great importance to the physician. Many of the functions are of a chemical nature: many diseascs require a chemical mode of treatment; and, without an acquaintance with it, two or more substances might be given in combination, which, by forming a chemical union, might give rise to other compounds, possessing very different virtues from the components taken singly, and thus the prescriber be disappointed in the results.

CIGAR', Cigar'ra, (S.) Cigarro, (F.) Cigare. A small tubular roll of tobacco, used for smoking. Medic''inal or Med'icated Cigars, (F.) Cigares Médicinaux, are made of dried plants, with, or without, the addition of medicinal articles. When rolled in paper, they form cigarettes, which may be used with or without combustion, as in the case of the Cigarettes de Camphre. The Cigarettes arsénicales de Boudin are made of paper impregnated with an aqueous solution of arsenious acid, or of arseniate of soda, and dried.

CIGARETTE, see Cigar — c. Arsénicale de Boudin, see Cigar—c. de Camphre, see Cigar.

CIL'IA (singular Cilium), Blephar'ides, Epicœ'lides, Pili palpebra'rum. The eyelashes, (Sc.) Winkers. The hairs on the eyelids. (F.) Cils. Their use seems to be, to prevent the entrance into the eye of light bodies flying in the atmosphere; and to diminish, in certain cases, the intensity of light. Also, the tarsi. Also, a peculiar sort of moving organs, resembling small hairs, vi'bratory or vi'bratile cil'ia, Cil'ia vibrato'ria, (F.) Cils vibratils, which are visible with the microscope in many animals. These organs are found on parts of the body which are habitually in contact with water, or other more or less fluid matters, and produce motion in these fluids, impelling them along the surface of the parts. Cilia have been found to exist in all vertebrated animals except fishes, having been discovered on the respiratory, uterine, and other membranes of mammalia, birds, and reptiles.

The terms "vibratory motion" and "ciliary motion" have been used to express the phenomena exhibited by the moving cilia; and it is probable, that this motion is concerned in the progression of fluids along the membranes. As yet, the motion has only been observed in the direction of the outlets of canals.

CILIAIRE, Ciliary.

CIL'IARY, Cilia'ris, (F.) Ciliaire. Relating to the eyelashes, or to cilia. This epithet has, also, been applied to different parts, which enter into the structure of the eye; from the resemblance between some of them (the ciliary processes) and the eyelashes.

CILIARY AR'TERIES, Arte'riæ cilia'res, (F.) Artères ciliaires. These are furnished by the ophthalmic artery. They are distinguished into, 1. Short or posterior (Art. uvéales—Chauss.) 30 or 40 in number, which are distributed to the ciliary processes. 2. Long, (Art. Iriennes of Chauss.,) two in number, which, by the anastomoses of their branches, form two arterial circles at the anterior surface of the iris: and, 3. The anterior, Arte'riæ cilia'res anterio'res of Haller, the number of which is variable. These pierce the sclerotic a few lines from its union with the cornea; and are principally distributed to the iris.

CILIARY BODY, Corpus Cilia'rē, Nexus Stamin'eus Oc'uli, Coro'na Cilia'ris, Ciliary Disc, (F.) Corps ciliaire. A ring of the choroid surrounding the crystalline in the manner of a crown; placed behind the iris and the ciliary circle. It resembles the disk of a radiated flower, and is formed by the union of the ciliary processes. See Ciliary Muscle.

CILIARY CANAL, Canal of Fonta'na. A small, extremely narrow circular space, formed between the ciliary circle, the cornea, and the sclerotica. It can be filled with injection, and it is not certain that it is not the cavity of a blood-vessel.

CILIARY CIRCLE, Ciliary ligament — c. Disc, Ciliary body—c. Ganglion, Ophthalmic ganglion.

CILIARY LIG'AMENT, C. Circle or Ring, Ligamen'tum seu Instertit''ium cilia'rē seu Fri'dis, Plexus cilia'ris, An'nulus seu Cir'culus seu Orbic'ulus cilia'ris, A. cellulo'sus, Com'missure of the Uvea, (F.) Commissure de la Choroïde—(Ch.), Ligament ou Cercle ciliaire, Cercle de la Choroïde, Ceinture blanche de la Choroïde. A species of greyish ring, of a pulpy consistence, situate between the choroid, iris, and sclerotica. The internal surface of the choroid is uniform, until it approaches within ten lines and a half of the edge of the cornea; here a dentated line is observed, termed ora serra'ta. The outer surface presents the an'nulus al'bidus seu gangliform'is, the anterior edge of which unites to the inner surface of the sclerotica and constitutes the ciliary ligament.

CIL'IARY or TARSAL MARGIN of the eyelids; (F.) Bord ciliaire. The edge in which the cilia or eyelashes are situate.

CILIARY MOTION, see Cilia.

CILIARY MUSCLE, Mus'culus cilia'ris. The part of the orbicularis palpebrarum in the vicinity of the ciliary margin. Also, the greyish, semi-transparent structure behind the ciliary ligament and covering the outside of the ciliary body. By its contraction the ciliary processes, and with them the lens, must be drawn towards the cornea. It appears to be the same muscle as the Tensor choroïdeæ, Pro'trahens lentis, or choroid muscle of some anatomists.

CILIARY NERVES (Nerfs Iriens,—Chauss.), (F.) Nerfs ciliaires. These are 12 to 16 in number. They arise from the nasal nerve, and particularly from the anterior part of the ophthalmic ganglion; and unite in two fasciculi, which pass around the optic nerve, and pierce the sclerotica near the entrance of that nerve into the eye. They are lost in the ciliary ligament.

CILIARY PLEXUS, C. Ligament.

CILIARY PROC''ESSES, Proces'sus seu Rad'ii seu Striæ cilia'res, (F.) Procès ciliaires, Rayons sous-iriens—(Ch.). Triangular folds, sixty or eighty in number, placed at the side of each other, and radiating, so as to resemble the disk of a radiated flower. They are lodged in depressions at the anterior part of the vitreous humour. The uses of these processes are not known.

CILIARY RING, Ciliary ligament.

CILIARY STRIÆ are numerous pale, radiated striæ in the posterior portion of the Corpus ciliare, but so covered by the Pigmentum nigrum as not to be distinctly seen till the paint is removed. The ciliary processes are formed by these striæ.

CILIARY VEINS, (F.) Veines ciliaires, follow nearly the same course as the arteries. In the choroid they are so tortuous, that they have received the name Vasa vortico'sa. They open into the ophthalmic vein.

CILIARY ZONE, Zona seu Zo'nula seu Lam'ina Cilia'ris, Membran'ula Coro'næ Cilia'ris. Under the corpus ciliare, the capsule of the vitreous humour sends off an external lamina, which accompanies the retina, and is inserted, with it, into the forepart of the capsule of the lens, a little before its anterior edge. This is the Zonula ciliaris, Zonula Zin'nii or Zonula of Zinn, Coro'na Cilia'ris, Orbic'ulus Cilia'ris. It is of a striated appearance and circular form, and assists in fixing the lens to the vitreous humour.

CIL'IATED, Cilia'tus, (F.) Cilié, from cilia. Provided with cilia—as "ciliated epithelium," the epithelium to which vibratory cilia are attached.

CILIUM, see Cilia.

CILLEMENT, Nictation.

CILLO. A name given by some authors to those whose upper eyelid is perpetually tremulous;—a trembling, which in some cases is called Life's blood. "To have life's blood in the eye," in other words, is to have this affection. Vogel calls it Cillo'sis.

CILLOSIS, Cillo.

CILS, Cilia—c. Vibratils, see Cilia.

CIMEX, C. lectula'rius. Acan'thia lectula'ria, Koris, κορις. The Bug; Wall, House or Bed Bug or Chinche. (F.) Punaise. Six or seven of these, given internally, are said to have prevented ague! There is scarcely anything which is sufficiently disgusting, that has not been exhibited for this purpose, and with more or less success. The bug has also been esteemed emmenagogue.

CIMICIFUGA, Actæa racemosa.

CIMO'LIA PURPURES'CENS, Terra Sapona'ria seu Fullon'ica, Fuller's Earth. A compact bolar earth, employed in the arts. Used at times as a cooling application to inflamed nipples, &c.

CIMO'LIA TERRA, Cimo'lia alba, Cimo'lus, Smectis, Smectris; from Κιμωλος, an island in the Cretan Sea, where it is procured. It was formerly used as an astringent, &c.—Scribonius Largus, Pliny. Probably, the same as the last.

CINCHO'NA. So called from the Spanish Viceroy's lady, the Countess de Cinchon, who was cured of fever by it at Lima, about 1638 Called also Cortex seu Pulvis Jesuit'icus, Jesuit's Bark or Powder, Cortex Patrum, because it was introduced into Europe by the Jesuits; also Pulvis Comitis'sæ or the Countess's Powder, and Cardinal del Lugo's Powder, Cortex Cardina'lis de Lugo, because he introduced it at Rome; and in France, Talbor's Powder and English remedy, because successfully used there by Sir Robert Talbor, who kept it a secret. It is the pharmacopœial name of several kinds of barks from various species of Cinchona, from the western coast of South America. Order, Cinchonaceæ. Sex. Syst. Pentandria Monogynia. Called, also, Cortex, Bark, Peruvian Bark, Cortex Chinæ seu China, Chinchi'na, Palos de Calentura, Kina Kina, (Bark of Barks,) Kinki'na, Cina Cina, Quina Quina, Quinqui'na, Magnum Dei donum, (F.) Quinquina; and in Peru Cascara and Cascarilla. CINCHO'NÆ CARIBÆ'Æ CORTEX, from Exostem'ma Caribæ'um, Caribæ'an or Saint Lucia Bark, (F.) Écorce de Saint Lucie, Quinquina Piton, from Exoste'ma floribund'um; and the Pitaya Bark, Quinquina bi'color, from an exostema [?] or from strychnos pseudoquina [?], are useful substitutes for the cinchona of Peru. These are the most important spurious barks. They contain neither quinia nor cinchonia.

CINCHONÆ CORDIFO'LIÆ CORTEX, Cortex flavus, Cinchonæ officina'lis cortex flavus, China re'gia seu Calisay'a, Cortex Chinæ re'gius seu flavus seu lu'teus, Yellow Royal or Calisay'a Bark, (F.) Quinquina jaune ou jaune royal, Calasaya. Odour aromatic; taste strong, bitter, astringent. Not rolled; often without the epidermis, which is very thick and inert; light, friable; fracture fibrous. Active principle Quinia. The false or spurious Calisaya barks are those of Cinchona

Calisaya, variety Josephiana; C. Boliviana, C. ovata, variety rufinervis, called, in Peru, Cascarilla Carabaya — the Carabaya bark of commerce;—of C. scrobiculata, two varieties, Cusco bark and Bark of St. Ann; of C. pubescens, which furnishes the Cusco or Arica bark; of C. micrantha and of C. amygdalifolia.

CINCHONÆ LANCIFO'LIÆ CORTEX, Cortex Peruvia'nus seu pal'lidus, Cinchonæ officina'lis cortex commu'nis, Cinchona pallida, Pale, Loxa or Crown Bark, (F.) Quinquina gris de Loxa, Quinquina Orange. Its odour is aromatic; taste pleasant, bitter, and astringent. The pieces are rolled in double or single quills. Epidermis brown, cracked; fracture resinous. Internally of a cinnamon colour. Its active principle is Cinchonia.

CINCHONÆ OBLONGIFO'LIÆ CORTEX, Cortex ruber, Cinchonæ officina'lis cortex ruber, Red Bark, (F.) Quinquina rouge, (Sp.) Cascarilla roxa and C. colorada, of S. America. Odour and taste the same as the pale, but more intense: in large flat pieces, solid, heavy, dry; fracture short and smooth; of a deep brownish-red colour. Although this variety of bark is assigned to the Cinchona oblongifolia by some, it would seem, that nothing is certainly known as to its source. Active principles, Cinchonia and Quinia.

The last three are the only officinal varieties in the Pharmacopœia of the United States. There are many other varieties, however, which are genuine cinchona barks, and yet have not been considered worthy of an officinal position. The Edinburgh Pharmacopœia admits, indeed, Cinchona cinerea, Grey bark, Silver bark or Huanuco or Lima bark, which is obtained around Huanuco in Peru, and, with the Jaen or Ash bark and the Huamilies bark, belongs to the class of pale or Loxa barks. Amongst the genuine but inferior barks are those brought from the northern Atlantic ports of South America, which, in commerce, are variously called Pitaya, Bogota, Carthagena, Maracaybo, and Santa Martha barks. The Bogota is also called Fusa gasuga and Coquetta bark.

All these barks are bitter, astringent, tonic, and eminently febrifuge. The yellow bark has been thought equal to any of the others, but the red contains more active principle. The discovery of their active principles is one of the most important gifts of modern chymistry. Still, in pernicious intermittents, the bark, in substance, is often demanded. It is employed in every disease in which there is deficient tone; but in cases where the stomach is much debilitated, the powder had better be avoided, in consequence of the woody fibre, which might disagree. Externally, it is used in enemata, gargles, &c., and in gangrenous ulcerations. When it excites nausea, an aromatic may be added to it; if purging, opium; if costiveness, rhubarb, &c. Dose, ℥ss to ℥j or more.

ESSENTIAL SALT OF BARK, as it is called, is an extract, prepared by macerating the bruised substance of bark in cold water, and submitting the infusion to a very slow evaporation.

CINCHONIA, Cinchonine — c. Tannate of, Quiniæ et cinchoniæ tannas.

CINCHON'ICINE, Cinchonici'na, Cinchonic''ia. When a salt of cinchonia is exposed to heat, with certain precautions, the alkaloid is changed into another, isomeric with itself, to which this name has been given. Cinchonicine, and its sulphate, possess the same medical properties as cinchonia and its salts. Dose, gr. v. to gr. xv.

CINCH'ONINE, Cinchoni'na, Cinch'onin, Cincho'nia. The active principle of Cincho'na lancifo'lia. An organic, crystalline alkali; of a white colour, and bitter, slightly astringent taste; very soluble in alcohol and ether, but almost in soluble in water.

Sulphate of Cinchonia, which is formed directly from cinchonia, is soluble in water and alcohol. The action of the sulphate of cinchonia is similar to that of the sulphate of quinia; but it is less energetic, and consequently requires to be given in a larger dose.

Physiologists give this name to the motion of the blood through the different vessels of the body—sanguimotion; — to that function, by which the blood, setting out from the left ventricle of the heart, is distributed to every part of the body by the arteries; — proceeds into the veins, returns to the heart, enters the right auricle, and passes into the corresponding ventricle, which sends it into the pulmonary artery to be distributed to the lungs, whence it issues by the pulmonary veins, and passes into the left auricle. From this it is sent into the left ventricle, and is again distributed by means of the arteries.

On distillation, they yield a small quantity of essential oil—O'leum Auran'tii, Oleum seu Essen'tia Nero'li,—with spirit and water, the Aqua Florum Auran'tii, Auran'tii floris aqua, Aqua aurantii, Orange-flower water. They were once used in convulsive and epileptic cases. The leaves, Fo'lia Auran'tii, have a bitterish taste, and furnish an essential oil. They have been used for the same purposes as the flowers. The yellow rind of the fruit, Auran'tii Cortex (Ph. U. S.), Citrus Bigara'dia (Ph. L.), Bigarade' or Bitter Orange, Orange Peel, is an aromatic bitter, and is used in dyspepsia, and where that class of remedies is required. The outer rind, Cortex Limo'num, Limo'nis Cortex (Ph. U. S.), Lemon Peel, Zest. Flave'do Corticum Citri, is used in the same cases as the Cortex Auran'tii.

The juice, Succus Limo'nis, Limo'num Succus (Ph. L.). (F.) Suc du Limon, Suc de Citron, is sharp, but gratefully acid, the acidity depending upon the citric acid it contains, and is given as a refrigerant beverage in febrile affections. In doses of half an ounce to an ounce, three times a day, it has appeared to exert a markedly sedative influence on the circulation, and has been given, apparently with benefit, in acute rheumatism and rheumatic gout. Alone, or combined with wine, it is prescribed in scurvy, putrid sore throat, &c. Its general properties are refrigerant and antiseptic. Sweetened and diluted, it forms Lemonade. Artificial lemon-juice is made by dissolving an ounce of citric acid in fourteen fluidounces of water; adding a few drops of essence of lemon.

Lemonpeel tea, or water, is made by paring the rind of one lemon, previously rubbed with half an ounce of sugar: the peelings and sugar are then put into a jar, and a quart of boiling water is poured over them. When cold, the fluid must be poured off, and a tablespoonful of lemon juice be added.

It is an agreeable drink in fevers.

CLIMA, Climate.

CLIMAC'TERIC, Climacter'icus, Climater'icus, from κλιμακτηρ, 'a step.' (F.) Climactérique ou Climatérique. A word, which properly signifies 'by degrees.' It has been applied to certain times of life, regarded to be critical.

At present, the word Climacteric is chiefly applied to certain periods of life, at which great changes occur, independently of any numerical estimate of years. Such are the period of puberty in both sexes; that of the cessation of the menses in women, &c.

CLIMACTERIC YEARS, Anni Climacter'ici, are, according to some, all those in the life of man, which are multiples of the number 7, Septen'niades. Others have applied the term to years, resulting from the multiplication of 7 by an odd number. Some have admitted only three climacterics; others, again, have extended them to multiples of 9. Most, however, have considered the 63d year as the Grand Climacteric;—63 being the product of the multiplication of 7 by 9, and all have thought that the period of three, seven, or nine, which they respectively adopted, was necessary to the entire renewal of the body; so that there was, at these times, in the economy, none of the parts of which it had previously consisted. The climacteric years have also been called, (Anni) hebdomad'ici, scala'res, grada'rii, scan'siles, genethliaci, natalit''ii, fata'les, crit'ici, decreto'rii, hero'ici, &c. All the notions on the subject are essentially allied to the doctrine of numbers of Pythagoras.

CLIMATAL, Climatic.

CLIMATE, Clima, Inclina'tio cœli, (F.) Climat, Gr. κλιμα, 'a region.' In geography, the word climate is applied to a space on the terrestrial globe, comprised between two circles parallel to the equator, and arbitrarily measured according to the length of the days. In a hygienic point of view, we understand by climate, since Hippocrates, a country or region, which may differ from another in respect to season, qualities of the soil, heat of atmosphere, &c. Climate, indeed, embraces, in a general manner, all the physical circumstances belonging to each region, —circumstances which exert considerable influence on living beings. The dark complexion of the inhabitants of the torrid zone is easily distinguishable from the paleness of those of the frigid,—so are the diseases. They are all modified, more or less, by climate or locality. Hot climates predispose to abdominal complications in febrile affections; cold climates to thoracic, &c.

One of the most important considerations with regard to climates is their comparative fitness for the residence of invalids, and especially of those who are liable to, or suffering under, catarrhal or consumptive affections. The great object, in such cases, is to select a climate which will admit of regular and daily exercise in the open air, so that the invalid may derive every advantage which this form of revulsion is capable of effecting. To an inhabitant of the northern and middle portions of the United States—and the same applies to Great Britain, France, and the northern parts of the old world—a more southern climate alone affords these advantages in an eminent degree. During the summer months there are few, if any, diseases, which require a milder climate than that of the United States, or of the milder districts of Europe. The temperature of the winter months is, consequently, the most important object of attention. Equability of temperature is essential, inasmuch as all sudden changes interfere with the great desideratum—exercise in the open air. In the whole continent of North America the changes are very sudden and extensive. It is not uncommon for the range to be 40°, between two successive days. So far, therefore, as this applies, the American climate is not well adapted to the invalid. In the southern portions, however, of the Union, this objection is counterbalanced by many advantages.

The following tables exhibit the mean temperature of the year, and of the different seasons—with the mean temperature of the warmest and coldest months at different places in America, Europe, Africa, &c., as deduced from the excellent paper of Von Humboldt on Isothermal Lines, the Meteorological Registers kept by the surgeons of the United States army, under the direction of Surgeon-generals Lovell and Lawson, 1822 to 1854, inclusive, the work of Sir James Clark on Climate, &c.

Certain of the tables show the mean monthly temperature, maximum, minimum and range, as well as the greatest daily, and mean daily range during the corresponding months — but of different years—at some of the prominent retreats for the valetudinarian in Great Britain, on the continent of Europe, and in the African islands. It is proper, however, to remark, that in no situations, except in those to which an asterisk is affixed, was the register thermometer used. In the others, the observations were made during the day only, and consequently the numbers given are far below the real range throughout the twenty-four hours. The places are ranged in the order of their mean temperature.

In the United States, the most favourable region for the phthisical invalid is that of Florida, —especially of Pensacola. St. Augustine is frequently chosen, but it is liable to north-east storms, which interfere with the out-door movements of the valetudinarian, and are the source of much discomfort. Still, great benefit has often been derived from it as a winter retreat. Of the Atlantic Isles, Madeira appears to be best adapted for the consumptive, and those affected with chronic bronchitis. In Italy, Rome, and Pisa,—and in England, Torquay and Undercliff, are to be preferred. Chronic rheumatism and gout are benefited by a warm climate, which, again, is unfavourable to those who are predisposed to cerebral diseases, especially to such as are characterized by debility and mobility of the nervous system—as paralysis, epilepsy, mania, &c. Hypochondriasis and dyspepsia require rather change of climate and travelling exercise than a sojourn in any one. (See the Author's Human Health, Philad., 1844).

For the mortality of different countries and cities, see Mortality.

The infusion of coffee is an agreeable and wholesome article of diet. It is, to a certain extent, a tonic, and is employed as such in convalescence, especially from fevers, &c. In cases of poisoning by opium, and in old asthmas, its use has been extolled. For this purpose the Moka is the best. It ought to be newly torrefied, but not too much burnt; should be strong, and drunk soon after grinding.

A highly azoted alkaloid was first found in coffee, and called Cafein or Caffein. It was afterwards discovered in the leaves of the tea plant, and called Thein, and in the Guarana of Brazil, and called Guaranin. In doses of from 2 to 10 grains, it induces violent nervous and vascular excitement. Caffein—as well as its various salts —the citrate, lactate, malate, and muriate, have been given as an antiperiodic in grain doses.

Factitious Coffees have been, from time to time, recommended, but they are infinitely inferior to the genuine. Various substitutes have been proposed; wheat, barley, hollyberries, acorns, sunflower seeds, beech-mast, peas, beans, succory-root, seeds of gooseberries and currants left in making wine, and washed,—sliced turnips, &c. These have been roasted, with the addition of a little butter or oil: but they have not the aroma of coffee. The best substitute is said to be the seeds of the Yellow water flag, Gladiolus luteus or Iris pseudacorus.

Hunt's Œconomical Breakfast Powder consisted of rye, roasted with a little butter.

Colica Callo'sa. Colic attended with sense of stricture in some parts of the intestinal canal; often of flatulency and pain; the flatulency gradually passing off by the stricture; the bowels tardy; and at length discharging small liquid stools.

Colica Convulsi'va, C. Spasmod'ica seu pituito'sa seu nervo'sa seu idiopath'ica, Enterospasm'us. Colic, not the symptom of any other affection. It is characterized by griping pain in the bowels, chiefly about the navel, with vomiting and costiveness — the pain increasing at intervals. The indications are to clear the intestines, and allay spasm. Calomel and opium — castor oil and opium — emollient and cathartic enemata, with fomentations, wet or dry, to the abdomen, usually succeed.

Colica Crapulo'sa, C. accidenta'lis seu helluo'num, Crap'ulent colic, Surfeit, Colic from overeating, (F.) Colique d'Indigestion. A colic, arising from eating indigestible aliments, or digestible aliments in too great abundance. The remedy is obvious.

There is not much to distinguish this variety of colic from others. The same violent pain about the navel is present, with retraction of the abdomen towards the spine. It is apt also to occasion palsy. The only difference of treatment is in the necessity for employing more opium along with the purgative. The paralytic sequelæ must be treated by change of air, rubbing the spine, exercise, &c. Treating the disease upon general principles is infinitely more philosophical, and more successful than the former empirical management at La Charité, Paris, which it is unnecessary to detail.

The Colic of Madrid, Poitou, Devonshire, Normandy, &c., has been called vegetable colic, (F.) Colique végétale, because ascribed to the use of new wine or cider, unripe fruit, &c., although really, perhaps, owing to the adulteration of wines and cider by litharge. All the symptoms, indeed, are those of Colica metallica.

Colica Nephret'ica, Nephroco'lica, Co'lica renal'is, Nephret'ic or Renal Colic, (F.) Colique Néphrétique. Acute pains, which accompany nephritis, and especially calculous nephritis, or the passage of a calculus into the ureter.

Colica Stercore'a, Colica Stipa'ta, Stercora'ceous Colic, (F.) Colique stercorale. A species of colic, ascribed to the retention of fæcal matters in the intestines. The retention is itself, however, an effect, that may be caused in the same manner as the colic pains themselves.

The ancients meant, by this term, the progressive diminution of the solid parts, with copious excretion of liquids by one or more passages. They thought, that all the solids melted; and that the liquids, and particularly the blood, lost a portion of their density.

When applied to a part, the ether evaporates, and the solid adhesive material is left, which contracts. Hence it is used in cases of wounds, to keep their edges together. It forms, also, a coating, and has been applied in abrasions, and in cases of burns. In various chronic cutaneous diseases, it has been applied with advantage; and has been employed to give a coating to pills, which it deprives of their taste, without interfering with their action.

COLON, C. Cœcum, Monen'terum, Colum, Intesti'num majus, I. cellula'tum, I. crassum et plenum, I. grandê, I. laxum, Physce, φυσκη. That portion of the large intestines which extends from the cœcum to the rectum. It is said to have been so called from κοιλος, 'hollow,' or from κωλυω, 'I arrest,' because the excrements are arrested, for a considerable time, in its sacs,—cel'lulæ seu haustra seu loculamenta coli. The colon is usually divided into four portions. 1. The right lumbar or ascending, Colon dextrum, situate in the right lumbar region, and commencing at the cœcum. 2. Transverse colon, Colon transver'sum, transverse arch of the colon, the portion of the colon which crosses from the right to the left side, at the upper part of the abdomen. 3. The left lumbar or descending colon, Colon sinis'trum, extending from the left part of the transverse arch, opposite the outer portion of the left kidney, to the corresponding iliac fossa. 4. The Iliac colon or Sigmoid flexure of the colon, (F.) Colon iliaque ou S. du colon, the portion of the intestine which makes a double curvature in the left iliac fossa, and ends in the rectum.

The muscular fibres, as in the cæcum, are in three flat stripes, Tæ'niæ seu Fasciæ Ligamento'sæ Coli, Tæ'niæ Valsal'væ seu Ligamen'ta coli.

COLON, Membrum — c. Inflammation of the, Colitis.

'glue,' on account of the viscidity of the first milk. (F.) Béton. The first milk after accouchement. It contains more serum and butter, and less casein than common milk, and seems to possess an evacuant property, which renders it fit to aid in the expulsion of the meconium. Colostrum formerly meant an emulsion prepared of turpentine and yolk of egg.

COLOUR-BLINDNESS, Achromatopsia.

COLOURS, ACCIDENT'AL, Op'positæ colours, Complemen'tary or Harmon'ic colours, (F.) Couleurs Complémentaires. If the eye has been for some time regarding a particular colour, the retina becomes insensible to this colour; and if, afterwards, it be turned to a sheet of white paper, the paper will not seem to be white, but will be of the colour that arises from the union of all the rays of the solar spectrum, except the one to which the retina has become insensible. Thus, if the eye be directed for some time to a red wafer, the sheet of paper will seem to be of a bluish-green, in a circular spot of the same dimensions as the wafer. This bluish-green image is called an ocular spectrum, because it is impressed upon the eye and may be retained for a short time; and the colour bluish-green, is said to be the accidental colour of the red. If this experiment be made with wafers of different colours, other accidental colours will be observed, varying with the colour of the wafer employed, as in the following table:—

Colour of the Wafer.	Accidental colour, or colour of the ocular spectrum.
Red	Bluish green.
Orange	Blue.
Yellow	Indigo.
Green	Violet with a little red.
Blue	Orange red.
Indigo	Orange yellow.
Violet	Yellow green.
Black	White.
White	Black.

If all the colours of the spectrum be ranged in a circle, in the proportions they hold in the spectrum itself, the accidental colour of any particular colour will be found directly opposite. Hence, the two colours have been termed opposite colours. It will follow from what has been said, that if the primary colour, or that to which the eye has been first directed, be added to the accidental colour, the result must be the same impression as that produced by the union of all the rays of the spectrum — white light. The accidental colour, in other words, is what the primitive colour requires to make it white light. The primitive and accidental colours are, therefore, complements of each other; and hence accidental colours have also been called complementary colours. They have likewise been termed harmonic, because the primitive and its accidental colour harmonize with each other in painting.

These terms have been applied to the extraordinary phenomenon of a rapid destruction of the human body, by being reduced to ashes either spontaneously or by the contact of an ignited substance. It is said to have occurred in the aged, and in those that were fat and hard drinkers. In such, Dr. Traill has found a considerable quantity of oil in the serum of the blood. Vicq d'Azyr, Lair, and Dupuytren think it necessary, that the body should be placed in contact with an ignited substance. Le Cat, Kopp, and Marc are of opinion that this is not necessary. The former appears to be the more probable view.

It formerly had a more extensive signification, and still has in France. It signifies the aggregate of physical characters presented by any individual, considered with respect to his external arrangement or condition. COMPRES'SION, Compressio, Enerei'sis. Same etymology. Pressure; methodical compression. An agent frequently had recourse to in surgery. We compress a limb, affected with œdema, varices, hydrops articuli, callous ulcer, &c. The abdomen is compressed after delivery, after paracentesis abdominis, &c. The compression is produced by means of the roller, laced stocking, &c., according to the part, and to the particular case. Moderate pressure aids the contractility of parts, and excites the action of the absorbents; so that large tumours at times disappear after it has been used for some time. A greater degree of pressure occasions, still more, the emaciation of the part, but it is apt to impede the circulation. Pressure is often used to stop or moderate the flow of blood in cases of aneurism or wounds of arteries and veins. In such cases, the compression may be immediate, when applied upon the artery itself, or it may be mediate, when applied through the integuments and soft parts. The French use the term Compression immédiate latérale for that which is exerted perpendicularly to the axis of a vessel, so as to flatten its sides. It is practised with the finger, forceps, tourniquet, compresses, &c.

COMPRES'SION OF THE BRAIN. This may arise either from coagula of blood, a soft tumour, a bony excrescence, a depressed portion of the skull, or the presence of some foreign body. The effects vary, according as the compression takes place suddenly or gradually. When suddenly, the symptoms are of the comatose or apoplectic character. When gradually, mania, convulsions, &c., are more likely to occur. Compression, arising from a depressed portion of skull, requires the use of the trephine.

COMPRES'SIVE, Compressi'vus, (F.) Compressif. That which compresses. A compressive bandage is one that compresses the parts to which it is applied.

COMPRES'SOR or COMPRESSO'RIUM OF DUPUYTREN, (F.) Compresseur de Dupuytren. An instrument for compressing the femoral artery, invented by Dupuytren. It is constructed on the same principles as the tourniquet of J. L. Petit, from which it only differs in this respect;— that, instead of being maintained in its place by a strap, which always compresses more or less the circumference of the limb, the two pads are placed at the extremities of a semicircle of steel, which, by passing from one to the other without touching the parts, limits the pressure to two opposite points of the thigh, and permits the collateral circulation to go on.

COMPRESSOR NARIS, Rinæ'us, Nasa'lis, Transversa'lis Nasi, Myrtiform'is, Dilatato'res ala'rum nasi, Constric'tor Nasi seu Na'rium seu Naris, Triangula'ris Nasi, (F.) Maxillo-narinal, Sus-maxillo-nasal, — (Ch.,) Compresseur du nez, Transversal du nez. COMPRES'SOR URE'THRÆ. A muscle consisting of two portions—one of which is transverse in its direction, and, in consequence of its having been particularly described by Mr. Guthrie, has been called Guthrie's muscle. It arises from the ramus of the ischium, and passes inwards to embrace the membranous urethra. The other portion is perpendicular, descending from the pubis and passing down to be inserted into the transverse portion of the muscle;—Pu'bio-urethra'lis. This portion has been considered by many to be only the anterior fibres of the levator ani; and having been described by Mr. Wilson, it has been called Wilson's muscle.

COMPRESSOR VENÆ DORSA'LIS PENIS. A small muscle, distinctly seen in animals, less distinctly in man, which arises from the ramus of the pubis, and ascending in a direction forwards is inserted above the vena dorsalis, joining with its fellow of the opposite side on the mesial line. Its use is supposed to compress the vein in erection. It is sometimes called the muscle of Houston, after Dr. Houston of Dublin.

CONCEP'TION, Concep'tio, Concep'tus, Cye'sis, Sylleps'is, Androlep'sia, from concipio, (com and capio,) 'I conceive.' The impregnation of the ovum by the positive contact of the male sperm, whence results a new being. The whole subject of conception is most mysterious. It seems to occur as follows. During the sexual union, the male sperm passes along the uterus and Fallopian tubes: the fimbriated extremities of the latter seize hold of the ovarium; and the sperm in this manner comes in contact with a maturated ovum, and impregnates it. The fecundated ovum remains some time in the ovarium, but at length bursts its covering, is laid hold of by the fimbriated extremity of the Fallopian tubes, and passes along the tube into the cavity of the uterus, where it remains for the full period of utero-gestation. Some are of opinion, that the ovum is not impregnated until it has entered the Fallopian tube, or uterus.

Concep'tion, False, Falsus Concep'tus, Spu'rium germen, (F.) Fausse Conception, Faux germe. An irregular, preternatural conception, the result of which is a mole or some similar production, instead of a properly organized fœtus. See Mole.

Conceptus Falsus, Conception, false.

CONCHA, Conchus, κογχη, 'a concave shell.' A liquid measure, amongst the Athenians, equal to half an ounce. Anatomists apply this term to several hollow parts of the body;—as the Concha of the Ear,— Concha Auris, Concha Auric'ulæ; (F.) Conque—the hollow part of the cartilage of the external ear. It has, also, been applied to the genital organs of the female; to the patella, &c.

CONCREMENTUM, Concretion.

CONCRETIO, Adherence, Concretion—c. Palpebrarum cum bulbo oculi, Symblepharosis.

CONCRE'TION, Concre'tio, Concremen'tum, from concrescere, concretum, (con and crescere,) 'to condense, thicken, become solid:' Pexis, Sympex'ie, πηξις, συμπηξις. The act of becoming thick or solid. It was once used synonymously with adhesion or growing together—as, "concretion of the toes." Most commonly, it is applied to extraneous and inorganic bodies, of a solid character, met with in different textures, after certain chronic inflammations; or which make their appearance in the joints or in the reservoirs for excrementitial fluids. Concretion is, therefore, frequently synonymous with Calculus, and is then rendered, in Latin, by the word Concrementum. But Concretion has a more extensive signification than Calculus; thus, accidental ossifications or deposits of phosphate of lime in certain organs, and especially in the liver and lungs, are properly called osseous concretions. They could not well be called osseous calculi.

CONCUS'SION, Commo'tion, from concutio, concussum, (con and quatere, 'to shake,') 'I shake together.' Concus'sio, Thlasma Concus'sio, Commo'tio, Anasis'mus, Tinagmus, (F.) Commotion. In Surgery, it is used for the agitation often communicated to one organ by a fall upon another; as to the brain from a fall on the breech, &c.

In all severe injuries, in sudden encephalic hemorrhage, and in overwhelming emotions, a concussion or shock is felt to a greater or less extent in the nervous system, which requires the careful attention of the physician.

CONCUSSION OF THE BRAIN, Commo'tio Cer'ebri, Apoplex'ia nervo'sa traumat'ica, Encephalosis'mus, (F.) Commotion du Cerveau, sometimes gives rise to alarming symptoms, even to abolition of the functions of the brain, yet without any sensible organic disease. Slight concussion of the brain, called stunning, consists in vertigo, tinnitus aurium, loss of memory, and stupefaction; all these being temporary. When more severe, there is instant loss of sensation and volition, vomiting, the patient being as if in a sound sleep, but there is no stertorous breathing. Pulse variable, generally more rapid and feeble than in compression; extremities cold. Little can be done here, till reaction has occurred: after this, the case must be treated according to general principles,—by bleeding, blisters, cold applied to the head, &c. After severe concussion, a patient, although apparently well, is not safe till some time after the accident.

CONDENSAN'TIA, from con and densus, 'dense;' Incrassan'tia. Medicines esteemed proper for inspissating the humours.

CON'DIMENT, Condimen'tum, Ar'tyma, Hedys'ma, Conditu'ra, from condire, 'to season.' (F.) Assaisonnement. Some substances are called, at times, aliments, and at others, condiments, according as they constitute the basis or the accessory to any dish: such are cream, butter, mushrooms, olives, &c. Others are always condiments, as they are only used to improve the savour of food, and contain but little nutritive matter. Such are pepper, salt, cinnamon, &c. Almost all condiments are possessed of stimulant properties.

CONDIT, Confectio.

CONDI'TUM, same etymon. A pharmaceutical compound of wine, honey, and some aromatics, especially pepper. Also, a confection.

CONDITURA CADAVERUM, Embalming.

CONDOM, Armour, (F.) Baudruche, Redingote Anglaise, Gant des Dames, Calotte d'assurance, Peau divine. The intestinum cæcum of a sheep, soaked for some hours in water, turned inside out, macerated again in weak, alkaline ley, changed every twelve hours, and scraped carefully to abstract the mucous membrane, leaving the peritoneal and muscular coats exposed to the vapour of burning brimstone, and afterwards washed with soap and water. It is then blown up, dried, cut to the length of seven or eight inches, and bordered at the open end with a riband. It is drawn over the penis prior to coition, to prevent venereal infection and pregnancy. It received its name from its proposer, Dr. Condom.

A kind of process, met with more particularly in the ginglymoid joints;—such as the condyles of the occipital, inferior maxillary bone, &c. Some anatomists have applied the term, however, to eminences that are not articular,—as to the lateral tuberosities at the inferior extremity of the os humeri, and even to certain depressions,—as to the concave articular surfaces at the upper extremity of the tibia. Chaussier calls the transverse root of the zygomatic process Condyle of the temporal bone.

They are four in number, seated in the occipital bone;—two anterior, and two posterior to the condyles or condyloid processes of the same bone, and to depressions, which are called Fossæ Condyloideæ.

As the word Condyloïdien means, 'that which has the shape of a condyle,' it has been judiciously proposed by some French anatomists that condylien should be used in preference, in the cases of the foramina and fossæ.

CONDYLOÏDIEN, see Condyloid Foramina.

CONDYLO'MA, Condylo'sis, Con'dylus, Verru'ca carno'sa, from κονδυλος, 'a knot,' 'an eminence.' It is an important symptom in febrile and other disorders. It may arise either from an extraordinary flow of blood by the arteries, or from a difficulty in the return of blood to the heart by the veins. More often, perhaps, it is owing to the latter cause, and is termed venous congestion, stasis or stagnation — being not unusually attended with symptoms of oppression and collapse. CONSTITU'TION, Constitu'tio, Catas'tasis, Status, from con, and statuere, from stare, 'to stand.' A collection of several parts, forming a whole. In medicine, Constitution means the state of all the organs of the human body considered in regard to their special and relative arrangement, order, or activity. A good constitution is one in which every organ is well developed, and endowed with due energy, so that all perform their functions with equal facility. Any want of equilibrium in their development and energy forms a difference in the constitution. We say that a man is of a good or robust, a delicate or weak constitution, when he is commonly healthy, or commonly labouring under, or unusually susceptible of, disease.

CONSULTA'TION, Consulta'tio, Delibera'tio, Cœnolog''ia, Conten'tio, Symboleu'sis, from consulere, consultum, 'to hold council.' This word has several acceptations. In English, it means, almost always, the meeting of two or more practitioners, to deliberate on any particular case of disease. In France, it signifies the written result of such deliberations, as well as the opinion of a physician, given to a patient, who consults him, either personally or by writing.

CONSULT'ING PHYSIC'IAN or SURGEON, (F.) Médecin ou Chirurgien consultant, Consultant. One who consults with the attending practitioner, regarding any case of disease. Some physicians, surgeons, and accoucheurs confine themselves to consulting practice.

This condition precedes death in the greater part of chronic diseases, and particularly in phthisis pulmonalis: on this account it is, that phthisis has received the name consumption—See Phthisis. Fièvre de Consomption, Consumptive fever, is the same as Hectic fever.

CONSUMPTION OF THE BOWELS, Enterophthisis.

CONTACT, Contac'tus, from con and tangere, tactum, 'to touch.' The state of two bodies that touch each other. In the theory of contagious diseases, we distinguish immediate or direct contact, as when we touch a patient labouring under one of those diseases; and mediate or indirect contact, when we touch, not the patient himself, but objects that have touched or emanated from him. The air is, most commonly, the medium by which this last kind of contact is effected.

CONTA'GION, Conta'gio, Conta'ges, Conta'gium, Aporrhœ'a, Apoc'ryeis. Same etymon. The transmission of a disease from one person to another by direct or indirect contact. The term has, also, been applied, by some, to the action of miasmata arising from dead animal or vegetable matter, bogs, fens, &c., but in this sense it is now abandoned. Contagious diseases are produced either by a virus, capable of causing them by inoculation, as in small-pox, cow-pox, hydrophobia, syphilis, &c., or by miasmata, proceeding from a sick individual, as in plague, typhus gravior, and in measles and scarlatina. [?] Scrofula, phthisis pulmonalis, and cancer, have, by some, been esteemed contagious, but apparently without foundation. Physicians are, indeed, by no means unanimous in deciding what diseases are contagious, and what not. The contagion of plague and typhus, especially of the latter, is denied by many. It seems probable, that a disease may be contagious under certain circumstances and not under others. A case of common fever, arising from common causes, as from cold, if the patient be kept in a close, foul situation, may be converted into a disease, capable of producing emanations, which may excite a similar disease in those exposed to them. Contagion and infection are generally esteemed synonymous. Frequently, however, the former is applied to diseases not produced by contact; as measles, scarlet fever, [?] &c., whilst infection, (Prov.) Swit, is used for those that require positive contact; as itch, syphilis, &c., and conversely. Diseases, which cannot be produced in any other way than by contagion, are said to have their origin in specific contagion; as small-pox, cow-pox, measles, hydrophobia, syphilis, &c. Those which are produced by contagion, and yet are supposed to be sometimes owing to other causes, are said to arise from common contagion; as typhus, cynanche parotidæa, &c.

CONTA'GIONIST, (F.) Contagioniste. One who believes in the contagious character of a particular disease,—as of yellow fever.

CONTA'GIOUS, Contagio'sus, (F.) Contagieux. Capable of being transmitted by mediate or immediate contact, Commu'nicable,—as a contagious disease, contagious fever, contagious effluvia, &c. Commonly, the epithet infectious, (Prov.) Taking, Smittle, Catching, is applied to those that are communicated by immediate contact, as itch, syphilis, &c.

CON'TINENT, Con'tinens. Restrained. This word is synonymous, also, with Continued; (F.) Continu.

CONTINENT CAUSE, Causa conjunc'ta, is a cause, real or presumed, which having given rise to a disease, continues to act during the whole of its duration. It may be considered synonymous with proximate cause. A continent fever, Febris continens, is one which preserves during its whole course, the same degree of intensity, without any remission or sensible exacerbation. A disease which continues uninterruptedly, has been also called Æipathei'a, Aeipathei'a or Aïpathi'a.

CONTIN'UED FEVER, Febris contin'ua seu con'tinens seu anabat'ica seu assid'ua. A fever which presents no interruption in its course. Continued fevers form a division in the class Pyrexiæ of Cullen, and include three genera,—Synocha, Synochus, and Typhus. It is proper to remark, that some of the older writers make a distinction between the continual fever, συνεχης, febris continua, and the synochus or febris continens. Thus, Rhases states that the synochus or continens is a fever, which consists of one paroxysm from beginning to end; whilst the continua is allied to intermittents.

CONTINUITY, DIARTHRO'SES OF, (F.) Diarthroses de Continuité, are movable joints, in which the bones are continuous, but do not touch immediately, there being between them a ligamentous substance, whose flexibility permits motion. The vertebral articulations are examples of this. DIARTHROSES OF CONTIGU'ITY, Diarthroses de Contiguité, on the other hand, are movable articulations, in which the bones are not continuous, but touch by surfaces covered with a cartilaginous layer, which is always moistened by synovia.

CONTINUITY, LESION OF, see Continuity, Solution of.

CONTINUITY, SOLUTION OF, Solu'tio contin'uĭ, is any division of parts, previously continuous. Wounds and fractures are solutions of continuity. The word Continuity is opposed to Contiguity: the latter meaning the condition of two things which are near each other, or touch without uniting. There is contiguity between the head of the humerus and the glenoid cavity of the scapula, but not continuity.

A le'sion of continu'ity, Læ'sio contin'uĭ, is a destruction of continuity caused by disease.

CONTONDANT, Contunding.

CONTORSIO, Contorsion—c. Columnæ vertebralis, Rhachiostrophosis.

CONTOR'SION, Contor'tio, from contorqueo, (con and torquere, tortum, 'to wring,') 'I twist about.' Violent movement of a part, accompanied with a kind of torsion, twist or cast; as contortion of the face.

CONTRACTIL'ITY, Contractil'itas: same etymon; (F.) Contractilité. That vital property, which gives, to certain parts, the power of contracting. The muscles of locomotion are endowed with a power of voluntary contractility, or one dependent immediately on the action of the brain:—the muscles of the viscera of digestion, and other internal organs, enjoy an involuntary contractility. Contractility and irritability are frequently used synonymously to signify the property possessed by any tissue of contracting on the application of an appropriate stimulus.

CONTRACTU'RA. Same etymon. Acamp'sia, Enta'sia articula'ris, Rigor ar'tuum, Muscular Stiff-joint, (F.) Contracture. A state of permanent rigidity and progressive atrophy of the flexor muscles, which prevents the motions of extension beyond a certain limit. The affected muscles form hard cords beneath the skin. On dissection, they are found converted into tendinous fibres, the fleshy fibres having almost disappeared, when the disease has been of any duration. It succeeds, frequently, other diseases, particularly rheumatism, neuralgia, convulsions, syphilis, colica pictonum, &c. The warm bath, vapour bath, or thermal waters, oleaginous embrocations, mechanical extension of the limbs, &c., are the chief means of treatment.

CONTRAFISSU'RA, from contra, 'against,' and findere, fissum, 'to cleave;' Repercus'sio, Reson'itus, Catag'ma Fissura contraja'cens, Apeche'ma, Anticom'ma, Antic'opē, Antieru'sis, Antierus'ma, Infortu'nium, Counterstroke, (F.) Contre-coup, Contre-fente, Contre-fracture. When the internal table yields and fractures. 2. When the bone breaks in any other part than the one struck. 3. When a bone, which has been struck, remains uninjured, and its neighbour is fractured. 4. When the bone is fractured in a place diametrically opposite to that struck, as in fractures at the base of the cranium, from a fall on the vertex; and lastly, when the violence of the blow produces a separation of the neighbouring or distant sutures. These fractures of the skull are also called Fractures par résonnance.

They are frequented by those labouring under cutaneous, scrofulous, and calculous affections.

CONTRIT'IO, Syntrim'ma, Syntrip'sis, Tritu'ra, Tritus, Trit''io, Tripsis, from contero, 'I bruise or make small:' Comminu'tion, Trituration.

CONTROSTIM'ULANT, Contrastim'ulans, Hyposthen'ic, from contra, 'against,' and stimulus, 'that which excites.' A substance that possesses a particular, debilitating property, acting upon the excitability in a manner opposite to stimulus. A name given to therapeutical agents, which, according to the Italian theory of contro-stimulus, are endowed with the property of diminishing excitement by a specific action. These agents are by no means clearly defined.

CONTROSTIM'ULUS or CONTRESTIMULUS, DOCTRINE OF, (F.) Contrestimulisme. Same etymon. The name given by Rasori, about thirty years ago, to a new medical doctrine, of which he was the originator—La nuova Dottrina Medica Italiana. It is founded on the contro-stimulant property attributed to a certain number of medicines. In this doctrine, as in that of Brown, under the name excitability, a fundamental principle of physiology is admitted, by virtue of which living beings are endowed with an aptitude for feeling the action of external agents or exciting influences, and of reacting on these influences. When this excitability is too great, there is excess of stimulus or Hypersthení'a: when too little, there is deficiency or Hyposthení'a. Diseases, general and local, are divided into three great classes, or into, 1. Hypersthenic; 2. Hyposthenic; 3. Irritative. The contro-stimulant physicians admit only two classes of medicines — stimulants and contro-stimulants.

An injury or lesion — arising from the impulse of a body with a blunt surface — which presents no loss of substance, and no apparent wound. If the skin be divided, the injury takes the name of contused wound. The differences of contusions, as to extent, are of course infinite. When slight, the blood stagnates in the capillaries of the skin, or is effused into the subcutaneous areolar tissue. Time and cold applications remove it. When the texture has been lacerated, there is effusion of blood, with more or less torpor in the part affected. Cooling applications, general or topical bleeding, emollients, poultices, &c., are here necessary, according to circumstances. In the severest kinds of contusion, all the soft and solid parts, except the skin, are bruised, and, at times, reduced to a kind of pap. When the disorganization is to this extent, there is no hope except in amputation. A deep contusion of the soft parts has been called Sarcoth'lasis, and Sarcothlas'ma.

CORACOBRACHIÆUS, Coracobrachialis.

CORACO-BRA'CHIAL, Cor'aco-Brachia'lis. Belonging both to the coracoid process and arm.

CORACO-BRACHIA'LIS (Muscle), Coracobrachia'us, Coraco-huméral—(Ch.), Perfora'tus CASSE'RII, Perforatus, is situate at the inner and upper part of the arm. It arises from the coracoid process of the scapula, and is inserted at the middle part of the inner side of the humerus. It carries the arm forwards and inwards, raising the humerus a little. It can, also, by acting inversely, depress the shoulder.

CORACO-CLAVIC'ULAR, Coraco-clavicula'ris. Belonging to the coracoid process and clavicle.

CORACO CLAVICULAR LIGAMENT — called, also, Omo-clavicular — serves to unite the clavicle to the coracoid process. It is very irregular, and formed of two fasciculi, which the greater part of anatomists have described as particular ligaments, under the names Conoid and Trapezoid.

CORACODES, Coracoid.

COR'ACOID, Coracoï'deus, Coracoï'des, Coraco'des, from κοραξ, κορακος, 'a crow,' and ειδος, 'resemblance.' (F.) Coracoïde. Resembling the beak of a crow. A name given by Galen — and still retained—to the short, thick process, situate at the anterior part of the upper margin of the scapula, which has some resemblance to the beak of a crow. Process'us Coracoï'deus seu uncina'tus seu cornicula'ris seu anchora'lis seu rostriform'is seu ancyroï'des, Crow's beak-like process. This process gives attachment to the Coraco-clavic'ular and Coraco-acro'mial ligaments, and to the Coraco-brachia'lis, Pectora'lis minor, and Biceps muscles.

CORACOID LIG'AMENT, Ligamen'tum coracoï'deum, (F.) L. Coracoïdien. This name is given to the small fibrous fasciculus, which converts the notch, at the superior margin of the scapula, into a foramen.

CORAIL, Coral — c. des Jardins, Capsicum annuum.

CORAL, Coral'lium, Coral'lus, Coura'lium, Arbor Maris, Azur, Bole'sis, from κορεω, 'I adorn,' and 'αλς, 'the sea;' and, according to some, from κορη, 'a daughter,' and 'αλς, 'the sea.' (F.) Corail. One of the most beautiful productions of the deep. It is fixed to submarine rocks, in the form of a shrub, and is of a bright red colour. It is the habitation of a multitude of animals, of the Zoophyta order, and is formed of a calcareous substance, secreted by the animals themselves. It is in very hard, concentric layers; covered, externally, by a species of porous bark, full of cellules, each of which contains one of these animals. Linnæus calls the red coral, Isis nob'ilis, and M. de Lamarck, Coral'lium rubrum. It is much fished for on the coasts of Barbary and Sicily. Coral was formerly esteemed tonic, absorbent, astringent, &c.; but analysis has shown, that it contains only carbonate of lime and a little gelatin. — Dioscorides, Pliny, Oribasius, the Geoponica, &c. Corallium album is a hard, white, calcareous, brittle substance, the nidus of the Madrep'ora ocula'ta. It has been given as an absorbent.

CORALLI'NA. Diminutive of Corallium: Muscus marit'imus, Corallina officina'lis, Brion, Corallina alba, Sea Cor'alline, White Worm-weed, (F.) Coralline blanche. The production of an animal, which belongs to the class Pol'ypi, and which is found in all the seas of Europe; — particularly in the Mediterranean. It has the appearance of a plant, is homogeneous, an inch or two in height, of a white, reddish, or greenish colour, salt taste, and marine smell. It contains gelatin, albumen, chloride of sodium, phosphate, carbonate, and sulphate of lime, carbonate of magnesia, silica, oxide of iron, and a colouring principle. It was once much used as a vermifuge; but is not now employed. Dose, ʒss to ʒj, in powder.

It is a mixture of several marine plants and zoophytes, as the fucus, ceramium, ulva, coralline, confervæ, &c., and has gained great reputation for destroying all kinds of intestinal worms, when given in strong decoction. The Geneva Pharmacopœia directs an official syrup — the Sirop de Coralline.

The grayish crust or buff, varying in thickness, observed on blood drawn from a vein during the existence of violent inflammation, pregnancy, &c. It is particularly manifest in pleurisy, and hence one of its names. For its production, it appears to be requisite, that there should be an increase in the proportion of the fibrinous element of the blood over that of the red corpuscles, with increased aggregation of those corpuscles. Under such circumstances, the buffy coat assumes a concave appearance on its upper surface, and the blood is, therefore, said to be cupped.

The buff is generally believed to consist of fibrin; but, according to the researches of Mulder, it is composed of a binoxide of protein, which is insoluble in boiling water, and a tritoxide which is soluble. These oxides are comprehended by him under the name oxyprotein.

When the blood presents the above appearance, it is said to be buffy.

CORK, Suber.

CORMUS. In botany, when the stem of a plant, without creeping or rooting, is distended under ground, retaining a round or oval form, it is so called. The Cormus is vulgarly termed a root,—radix.

CORN, (Saxon CORN,) (G.) Kern. In England, this word means the Cerealia, or those seeds, which grow in ears, not in pods. In the United States, Corn always means Indian Corn. Its English sense corresponds to the French Blé or Bled.

CORN, Clavus, Clavus Pedis, Ecphy'ma Clavus, Gemur'sa, (F.) Cor, Ognon, from cornu, 'a horn.' A small, hard, corneous tumour, which forms upon the foot, generally on the toes; and is commonly produced on the most projecting parts, by the pressure of too tight shoes. A part of the corn is raised above the skin, and forms a round tumour, like the head of a nail: the other portion, which serves as its base, is buried more or less deeply in the integuments, and occasionally extends as far as the tendons and periosteum. Corns may, sometimes, be removed, by immersing the feet in warm water, but commonly they return. They can, likewise, be destroyed by the knife or caustic, or by paring them down and pulling them out by the roots; but these operations are not always as simple as they seem. In the way of palliation, they must be constantly pared; and, for the purpose of preventing pressure, any soft plaster, spread upon linen or leather, may be applied, with a hole in the centre to receive the corn; and layer after layer of plaster be added, until they attain the level of the corn. When very irritable, the lunar caustic, rubbed over the surface, will generally diminish irritability surprisingly, and in a mode not easy of explanation.

The transparent cornea. (F.) Cornée. One of the coats of the eye, so called because it has some resemblance to horn. It is termed transparent to distinguish it from the opake — Cornea opa'ca or Sclerotic. It is convex, anteriorly; concave, posteriorly; forming nearly one-fifth of the anterior part of the eye, and representing a segment of a sphere about seven lines and a half, or in. 0·625 in diameter. It seems to be constituted of laminæ in superposition, but of the precise number anatomists are not agreed. Henle assigns it four; the third, a very solid cartilaginous lamella, being called Membrane de Demours or M. de Descemet: see Aqueous humour. Messrs. Todd and Bowman assign it five layers.

CORNU AMMO'NIS, C. Arie'tis, Hippocam'pus major, Pes hippocam'pi major, Pes Hippopot'ami major, Protuberan'tia cylind'rica, Vermis Bombyc''inus, Proces'sus cer'ebri latera'lis, (F.) Corne d'Ammon ou de Bélier, Grande Hippocampe, Pied de cheval marin, I rotubérance cylindroïde (Ch.), Bourrelet roulé. A broad, considerable eminence, curved on itself, and situate at the posterior part of the lateral ventricle. They contain about 27 per cent. of gelatin. The Shavings, Raspatu'ra seu Ras'ura Cornu Cervi, C. C. raspa'tum, boiled in water, have, consequently, been esteemed emollient and nutritive.

Hartshorn Jelly may be made as follows: — Hartshorn shavings, ℥vj; boil in water Oiv to Oij; strain, and add, whilst hot, of lemon-juice, two tablespoonfuls; white sugar, ℥vj; and Sherry wine, two glasses. A good nutriment for the sick, where wine is not improper.

When burnt, the shavings constitute the Cornu cervi calcina'tum, Cornu ustum, Phosphas Calcis, Calca'ria phosphor'ica, (F.) Corne de cerf calcinée, Phosphate de chaux, which consists of 57·5 per cent. of phosphate of lime. It has been used as an antacid, but is wholly inert, as its composition would indicate. It contains only 1 per cent. of carbonate of lime.

Phosphate of lime has also been given in osteomalacia, from a presumption that the disease is owing to a deficiency of earthy matter in the blood, which is doubtless an error—the fault being in the agents of assimilation or the cells of nutrition. With as little propriety, it has been proposed as an excitant to the healthy action of the cells in tuberculosis.

Bone earth is usually sold in the shops for burnt hartshorn.

The Dublin Pharmacopœia has a Calcis phosphas præcipita'tum, prepared by dissolving burnt ox bones in muriatic acid, and precipitating by solution of ammonia. The dried precipitate, called bone phosphate of lime, has no virtues not possessed by the cornu ustum.

Scattered through the plexus formed by the blood-vessels and uriniferous tubes in the kidney, a number of small dark points may be seen with the naked eye, which received their name from Malpighi, their describer. Each of these, under the microscope, is found to consist of a convoluted mass of blood-vessels, which constitutes the true glandule, corpuscle, or glomerule of Malpighi. It was at one time supposed that the tubuli uriniferi originate in them; but this does not appear to be the case. Their use is not positively known, but as they have been traced by Mr. Bowman into the commencement of the urinary tubes, in which they lie uncovered, it has been supposed that their office may be to separate the watery portions of the blood to be mixed with the proper urinous matter.

The posterior pyramids — fascic'uli gra'ciles — are described as distinct from the restiform bodies. They are situate in contact with each other, one on each side of the posterior median fissure. They become closely applied to the restiform bodies, and have been considered to be blended with them, and to proceed to form the cerebellum. According to some, they ascend to the cerebrum.

CORTEX OVI, Cor'tical membrane. This membrane, so called by Boer and Granville, is usually regarded as a uterine production, and designated Decid'ua reflex'a. They consider it to surround the ovule, when it descends into the uterus, and to enclose the shaggy chorion. It is absorbed during the first months of utero-gestation, so as to expose the next membrane to the contact of the decidua, with which a connexion takes place at the part where the placenta is to be formed. In that part, Boer and Granville consider, that the Cortex Ovi is never altogether obliterated, but only made thinner, and in process of time is converted into a mere pellicle or envelope, which not only serves to divide the filiform vessels of the chorion into groups or cotyledons, in order to form the placenta, but also covers those cotyledons. This, Dr. Granville calls membra'na pro'pria. See Decidua membrana.

CRANIOL'OGY, Cranios'copy, Craniolog''ia, Cranioman'cy, Phrenol'ogy, Cranioscop'ia, C. Gallia'na, Encephaloscop'ia, Doctri'na Gallia'na. (F.) Craniologie, Cranioscopie. Words introduced, since Gall, into medical language. The first two terms are respectively derived from κρανιον, 'cranium,' λογος, 'a discourse,' and σκοπειν, 'to examine.' They signify a description, or simply an examination, of the different parts of the external surface of the cranium, in order to deduce from thence a knowledge of the different intellectual and moral dispositions. Strictly speaking, it is by Cranioscopy that we acquire a knowledge of Craniology, Organology, or Cranology, as it has been variously termed. These words are generally, however, used in the same sense. The cranium being moulded to the brain, there are as many prominences on the bone, as there are projections at the surface of the brain. According to Gall, each projection, which he calls an organ, is the seat of a particular intellectual or moral faculty, and all persons endowed with the same faculty, have, at the same part of the brain, a prominence, which is indicated, externally, by a bump or projection in the bony case. The System of Gall is made to comprise 27 prominences, which answer to 27 faculties. The following Table exhibits these supposed organs, and their seat:

CEREBRAL ORGANS AND THEIR SEAT, ACCORDING TO GALL.

1. Instinct of generation, of reproduction; amativeness; instinct of propagation; venereal instinct. (German.) Zeugungstrieb, Fortpflanzungstrieb, Geschlechtstrieb.	Seated in the cerebellum. It is manifested at the surface of the cranium by two round protuberances, one on each side of the nape of the neck.

A fundamental principle with the Craniologists or Phrenologists is,—that the brain does not act as a single organ, but that it consists of a plurality of organs: but, were we able to admit this, the assignment of the seat of different faculties could not but be considered premature.

It extends from the outer surface of the cricoid cartilage to the lateral parts of the inferior margin of the thyroid cartilage ; and its use is to approximate, anteriorly, the corresponding margins of the cricoid and thyroid cartilages ; and thus to stretch the ligaments of the glottis, which it contracts by separating the thyroid cartilage from the arytenoid.

CRISIS, Diac'risis, Dijudica'tio, 'decision;' from κρινω, 'I decide.' This word has been used in various acceptations. Some mean by crisis of a disease, when it augments or diminishes considerably, becomes transformed into another, or ceases entirely. Some have used the word to signify only the favourable changes which supervene in disease; others, for the change going on in the acme or violence of the disease. Others, again, have given this name only to a rapid and favourable change, joined to some copious evacuation or eruption; whilst others have applied the term to the symptoms that accompany such change, and not to the change itself;—thus including, under the same denomination, the critical phenomena and the crisis.

CRITICAL DAYS, Dies crit'ici seu judicato'rii seu Decreto'rii seu Prin'cipes seu Radica'les seu Contemplab'iles seu Internun'cii, (F.) Jours critiques, are those on which a crisis, it is imagined, is most likely to happen. According to Hippocrates and Galen, the greatest number of fevers terminate favourably on the 7th day, and many on the 14th;—these two days being the most propitious. Next to these come, in order of efficiency, the 9th, 11th, 20th or 21st, 17th, 5th, 4th, 3d, 18th, 27th, and 28th. The sixth day was called by Galen, the Tyrant, τυραννος, because the crises that happened then were generally unfavourable. After this, the most unfavourable were the 8th, 10th, 12th, 16th, and 19th. The 13th was a sort of neutral day; the crises which happened on it being neither favourable nor unfavourable. Days were, also, divided into Inter'calary, on which the crises happened less frequently, and were less complete than on the critical or indicatory;—and into vacant and non-dec'retory, on which a crisis hardly ever occurred. According to this division, they were enumerated as follows:

Critical days	7th, 14th, 20th, 27th, 34th, 40th, 60th, &c.
Indicatory days	4th, 11th, 17th, 24th, &c.
Intercalary days	3d, 5th, 6th, 9th, &c.
Non-decretory days	2d, 8th, 10th, 12th, 13th, &c.

Fortunate crises were considered to be indicated by favourable signs appearing three days before.

CRURÆUS, Cruralis.

CRURAL, Crura'lis, from crus, cruris, 'the thigh, and lower limb.' What belongs to the thigh or lower limb.

Crural Arch, In'guinal or Fem'oral Arch, (F.) Arcade crurale ou inguinale (Ch.), Poupart's Lig'ament, L. of Fallo'pius. This arch is formed by the internal portion of the inferior edge of the aponeurosis of the obliquus externus muscle, which is attached, at one end, to the pubis; at the other, to the anterior and superior spinous process of the ilium. At its posterior and inner part, the aponeurosis, forming the arch, sends off a falciform reflection, which is attached along the crest of the pubis, and is known under the name of Gimbernat's Ligament. Beneath this arch, the vessels, nerves, and muscles make their exit from the pelvis to the thigh.

Crural Artery, Arte'ria Crura'lis, Fem'oral Artery, (F.) Artère crurale, A. Pelvi-crurale,—(Ch.,) is the continuation of the external iliac. It extends from the crural arch to the aperture in the triceps, or to the ham. Chaussier applies the name Artère crurale to the trunk, which extends from the primitive or common iliac to the tibial arteries—embracing, of course, the external iliac, femoral, and popliteal.

Crural Canal, Crural Ring, Fem'oral canal or ring. M. Jules Cloquet has described this canal with minuteness, and given it the name Anneau crural, Anneau fémoral. It is nearly an inch long, triangular, more spacious above than below, and shorter and broader in the female than in the male. Its upper orifice is bounded, anteriorly, by the crural arch; posteriorly, by the crista of the pubis; on the outer side by the psoas and iliacus muscles, covered by the iliac aponeurosis, and, at the inner, by Gimbernat's ligament. This orifice is covered by the peritoneum, and, according to M. Cloquet, is closed by a more or less resisting septum, which he has named Septum crura'lè, Crural septum. In its course, the crural canal has its anterior parietes formed by the superficial expansion of the fascia lata: the posterior by the pectineus, covered by the deep-seated expansion of the fascia; and more externally by the psoas and iliacus muscles, covered by an expansion of the fascia iliaca. Its inferior orifice is formed by the foramen of the fascia lata, which gives passage to the vena saphæna. It is at the upper orifice of this canal, that Femoral or Crural Hernia, Hernie inguinale of Chaussier, occurs: which would be more common, were it not for the fibrous cellular septum there situate.

Crural Nerve proceeds from the lumbar plexus, and is situate at the outer side of the psoas muscle and crural artery. After it has passed under the crural arch, it divides into cutaneous and muscular branches. One of the branches, which is larger than the rest, is called the Saphæ'na nerve. It gives off filaments to the integuments of the knee, to the inner part of the leg, and to the dorsal surface of the foot. The remainder of the branches of the crural are distributed to the anterior and inner part of the thigh. The Ac'cessory of the Crural Nerve is a term given to the 4th and 5th pairs of lumbar nerves.

Crural Plexus of Chaussier is the union of the anterior branches of the last four pairs of lumbar nerves, and the first four sacral; forming the lumbar and sacral plexuses of most anatomists.

Crural Ring, Crural canal — c. Septum, see Crural canal.

Crural Vein, Fem'oral Vein, has the same arrangement as the artery. It receives only one great branch, the saphæna.

CRURAL, Triceps cruris.

Crura'lis, Cruræ'us. A part of the Triceps crural of the French, or of the Trifémororotulien of Chaussier. The cruralis is situate at the anterior, outer, and inner part of the thigh. It arises fleshy, from between the two trochanters, adheres firmly to most of the fore part of the os femoris, and is inserted, tendinous, into the upper part of the patella, behind the rectus. Its use is to assist the vasti and rectus in the extension of the leg. Under Muscle Triceps Crural, the French describe the cruralis and the two vasti. Some small muscular slips, sometimes found under the crureæus muscle, and inserted into the capsular ligament of the knee-joint, have been called Sub-cruræ'i.

CUBITAL ARTERY, Arte'ria cubita'lis, A. ulna'ris, arises from the humeral a little below the bend of the elbow; proceeds along the anterior and inner part of the forearm; passes anterior to the ligamentum annulare of the carpus, and goes to form, in the palm of the hand, the superficial palmar arch. Besides the numerous muscular branches, which it gives off in its course, it sends posteriorly the common trunk of the interosseous arteries, and internally, the two cubital recurrents, anterior and posterior,—articular branches, which anastomose on the inside of the elbow with the divisions of the humeral artery.

CUBITAL MUSCLES are two in number. 1. The Cubita'lis ante'rior seu inter'nus, Flexor carpi ulna'ris, Ulna'ris inter'nus, Epitrochlo-cubito-carpien, Cubito-carpien — (Ch.), is a long muscle, situate at the anterior and inner part of the forearm. It arises from the inner condyle of the os humeri, at the inner side of the olecranon, and from the posterior edge of the ulna, and is inserted by a tendon into the os pisiforme. Its use is to bend the hand on the forearm, by directing it slightly inwards. 2. The Cubitalis poste'rior seu exter'nus, Extenseur Carpi ulna'ris, Ulna'ris exter'nus, Cubite'us exter'nus, Cubito-sus-métacarpien — (Ch.), is situate at the posterior part of the forearm. It arises from the external condyle of the os humeri, and is inserted into the superior extremity of the fifth bone of the metacarpus. Its use is to extend the hand, inclining it a little inwards.

CUBITAL NERVE, Ulnar nerve, Cubito-digital— (Ch.), is furnished by the last two or three nerves of the brachial plexus, and is distributed to the inner and anterior side of the forearm; to the inner part of the palm and of the back of the hand, and to the last two or three fingers.

S. g. 7.87; ductile; very malleable; less hard than iron; easily oxidized. In its metallic state, it exerts no action on the system. When swallowed, it undergoes no deleterious change. Copper cannot be dissolved whilst tin is in the mixture, and hence the utility of tinning copper vessels. Copper culinary vessels are harmless under ordinary cleanliness, provided the substances be not suffered to remain in them till cold. The salts of copper are very deleterious.

Cutaneous Exhalation and Absorption are those which take place from the skin.

Cutaneous, Middle Posterior, see Sciatic nerve, lesser.

Cutaneous Nerves, Cutaneal Nerves, so called, of the upper extremity, are two in number. They are given off from the brachial plexus. The internal cutaneous, Cubito-cutané, (Ch.,) descends along the inner part of the arm, and divides above the elbow into two branches; the outermost of which follows the outer edge of the biceps, and spreads over the anterior and inner part of the forearm; and the innermost accompanies the basilic vein, passing to the corresponding side of the hand and little finger. The external cutaneous, Radio-cutané (Ch.,) Mus'culo-Cuta'neus, Per'forans Casse'rii, passes outwards; perforates the coraco-brachialis; descends along the anterior and outer part of the arm; passes as far as the middle fold of the elbow under the median cephalic; and descends along the anterior and outer edge of the forearm. At some distance above the wrist, it divides into two branches; an outer, which is distributed on the back of the hand, the thumb and index finger; and an inner, which descends on the muscles of the thumb into the palm of the hand, and divides into fine filaments, which may be traced to the fingers.

Cutaneous nerves, Middle cutaneous, two in number, are branches of the crural or femoral nerve. They are distributed to the integument of the middle and lower part of the thigh and of the knee.

Nervus Cutaneus Minor, Lesser internal cutaneous nerve, Nerve of Wrisberg, takes its origin from the axillary plexus, but is more particularly connected with the ulnar nerve. It soon separates from the ulnar, running afterwards between it and the inner side of the arm. A little below the axilla it divides into two branches, which are distributed to the arm.

Chaussier calls the cephalic and basilic veins the Radial and Cubital Cutaneous.

CUTIS, Pellis, Pella, Co'rium, Derma, Deris, Anthro'pē, Anthro'pen, Skin, (F.) Peau, Derme. A dense, resisting membrane, of a flexible and extensible nature, which forms the general envelope of the body; and is continuous with the mucous membranes, through the different natural apertures. It is generally considered to be formed of three distinct layers—the epidermis, rete or more properly corpus mucosum, and corium (cutis vera, derma). Some anatomists, however, separate it into several others. Its outer surface is covered by a number of small eminences, called papillæ, which are generally regarded as essentially nervous and vascular. The skin is our medium of communication with external bodies. It protects the subjacent parts; is the seat of touch; and through it are exhaled the watery parts of the blood, which are not needed in the nutrition of the body. The state of the skin, as regards heat and dryness, affords useful information in pathological investigations. Its colour, too, requires attention: the paleness of disease is as characteristic as the rosy complexion of health. The colour of the skin varies according to the age, sex, &c. As a general rule, it is finer in the female and child than in the male and adult. In old age it becomes light-coloured, thin, and dry. It likewise varies according to the races, &c.

Such communication does not, however, always occasion the blue disease, but it is generally thought that the disease never exists without this stato of parts; or without some obstacle to the circulation in the right side of the heart. The blueness does not seem to be owing to the admixture of black and red blood. A child affected with blueness is said to be cyanosed, (F.) Cyanosé.

It is often epidemic, and generally contagious [?]; and is frequently found accompanying scarlet fever,—giving rise to the variety, Scarlatina maligna, Canker rash. Cynanche maligna has been made to include both diphtheritic and gangrenous pharyngitis. See Pharyngitis, diphtheritic.

The general treatment is the same as in typhus; and stimulant antiseptic gargles must be used, consisting, for example, of the decoction of bark and muriatic acid.

It is very conspicuous externally, and is often accompanied with swelling of the testes in the male, and of the mammæ in the female; the testes being sometimes absorbed afterwards. It is generally epidemic, and apparently contagious. [?] The treatment is very simple; the adoption merely of the antiphlogistic plan, under which it usually soon disappears. When inflammation of the mammæ or testes supervenes, it must be treated as if idiopathic.

Epidem'ic Paroti'tis or Mumps is also termed Paroti'tis polymor'pha seu epidem'ica seu specif'ica.

This disease can hardly be said to differ, in pathology or treatment, from Cynanche tonsillaris. The same may be remarked of the Cynanchē Œsophage'a, Œsophagi'tis.

CYNANCHE PRUNELLA, C. Tonsillaris—c. Purpuro-parotidæa, Cynanche maligna—c. Simplex, Isthmitis—c. Stridula, C. trachealis.

CYNANCHE TONSILLA'RIS, C. fau'cium seu Prunella, Empresma Paristhmi'tis Tonsilla'ris, Synan'chē, Amygdali'tis, Branci, Branchi, Hyan'chē, Tonsilli'tis, Paristh'mia, Paristhmi'tis, Dysphag'gia inflammato'ria, Antiadi'tis, Angina inflammato'ria seu cum tumo'rē seu tonsilla'ris seu synocha'lis seu sanguin'ea seu vera et legit'ima, Inflamma'tio Tonsilla'rum, Antiadon'eus inflammato'rius, Inflammatory Sore Throat, Common Squinancy, Squinzey, Squinsy or Quinsy, (F.) Amygdalite, Inflammation des Amygdales, Angine tonsillaire, Pharyngite tonsillaire, Esquinancie, Squinancie, Catarrhe guttural, Angine gutturale inflammatoire. The characteristic symptoms of this affection are, swelling and florid redness of the mucous membrane of the fauces, and especially of the tonsils; painful and impeded deglutition, accompanied with inflammatory fever. It is generally ascribed to cold, and is one of the most common affections of cold and temperate climates. It usually goes off by resolution, but frequently ends in suppuration.

Common sore throat is an affection of no consequence. It requires merely rest, and the observance of the antiphlogistic regimen. When more violent,—in addition to this,—bleeding, local or general, or both,—purgatives, inhalation of the steam of warm water; acid, or emollient gargles; rubefacients externally, or sinapisms or blisters. When suppuration must inevitably occur, the continued use of the inhaler must be advised, and an opening be made into the abscess as soon as pus shall have formed. If the patient be likely to be suffocated by the tumefaction, bronchotomy may be necessary.

CYNANCHE TRACHEA'LIS, Cynanche laryngæ'a of some, C. strid'ula, Suffoca'tio strid'ula, Asthma infan'tum, Catar'rhus suffocati'vus Barbaden'sis, Angi'na polypo'sa seu membrana'cea seu polypo'sa seu pernicio'sa seu inflammato'ria seu suffocato'ria seu strepito'sa seu cani'na seu exsudato'ria seu trachea'lis, Empres'ma bronchi'tis seu bronchlemmi'tis, Laryngi'tis et Trachei'tis infan'tilis, Laryngi'tis exsudati'va seu membrana'cea seu polypo'sa, Laryngos'tasis seu Laryngotrachei'tis, Laryngo-tracheitis with diphtherit'ic exuda'tion, Laryngoc'acē, Orthopnœ'a cynanchica, Cynanchorthopnœ'a, Pædanchonē [?], Morbus Strangulato'rius, Trachi'tis, Trachei'tis, Trachelī'tis, Diphtheri'tis trachea'lis, Expectora'tio Sol'ida, Cauma Bronchi'tis, Croup, Roup, Hives, Bold Hives, Choak, Stuffing, Rising of the lights, (F.) Angine laryngée et trachéale, Laryngite avec production de fausses membranes, Laryngite pseudo-membraneuse. A disease characterized by sonorous and suffocative breathing; harsh voice; cough, ringing, or like the barking of a dog; fever, highly inflammatory. It is apt to be speedily attended with the formation of a false membrane, which lines the trachea beneath the glottis, and occasions violent dyspnœa and suffocation, but is sometimes expectorated. The dyspnœa, as in all other affections of the air-passages, has evident exacerbations. It differs in its character in different situations; being infinitely more inflammatory in some places than in others, and hence the success obtained by different modes of treatment. It chiefly affects children, and is apt to recur, but the subsequent attacks are usually less and less severe.

As a general rule, it requires the most active treatment; bleeding from the arm or neck, so as to induce paleness; leeches applied to the neck, &c., according to the age,—the warm bath, olisters to the neck or chest, and purgatives. Formidable as the disease may be, if this plan be followed early, it will generally be successful. Many specifics have been recommended, but the search has been idle and fruitless. The majority of cases of what are called croup are not of this inflammatory cast; but are more of a spasmodic character, and have been termed by the French faux croups, and with us are occasionally termed spasmodic croup. They generally yield to an emetic and the warm bath.

DEATH, (Sax. ᵭeaᵭ,) (Sc.) Dede, Deid; Apobio'sie, Abio'sie, Extinc'tio, Ob'itus, Psychorag''ia, Psychorrhag''ia, Le'thum, Letum, Mors, Inter'itus, Than'atos, Decease, (F.) Mort. Definitive cessation of all the functions, the aggregate of which constitute life. Real Death, Apothana'sia, is distinguished from asphyxia or apparent death—the latter being merely a suspension of those same functions. But it is often difficult to judge of such suspension, and the only certain sign of real death is the commencement of putrefaction. At times, therefore, great caution is requisite to avoid mistakes. Death is commonly preceded by some distressing symptoms, which depend on lesion of respiration, circulation, or of the cerebral functions, and which constitute the agony. That which occurs suddenly, and without any, or with few, precursory signs, is called sudden death. It is ordinarily caused by disease of the heart, apoplexy, the rupture of an aneurism, or by some other organic affection. Death is natural, (Sc.) Strae-death, when it occurs as the result of disease: violent, when produced by some forcible agency. It may likewise affect the whole body, or a part only; hence the difference between somatic and molecular death.

The chief varieties of the modes of death may be thus given:

Death beginning at the heart, { Suddenly—Syncope: Gradual—Asthenia.
" " in the lungs—Asphyxia.
" " in the brain—Apoplexy.
" " in the gray matter of the medulla, { Paralysis of pneumogastrics, &c.
" " in the blood [?]—necræmia.

As it was at one time conceived, with Bichat, that death must commence in the heart, lungs, or brain, these organs were called a'tria mortis, 'the halls of death.'

DEATH, APPARENT, Asphyxia.

DEBIL'ITY, Debil'itas, Astheni'a, Hyposthenu'a, Blaci'a, Anenerge'sia, Anenergi'a, Weakness, (F.) Faiblesse. A condition, which may be induced by a number of causes. It must not be confounded with fatigue, which is temporary, whilst debility is generally more permanent.

Debility may be real, or it may be apparent; and, in the management of disease, it is important to attend to this. At the commencement of fever, for example, there is often a degree of apparent debility, which prevents the use of appropriate means, and is the cause of much evil. Excitement is more dangerous than debility.

DÉBOITEMENT, Luxation.

DÉBORDEMENT (F.), from déborder (de and border), 'to overflow.' A popular term for one or more sudden and copious evacuations from the bowels. It is chiefly applied to bilious evacuations of this kind—Débordement de Bile.

In a more general acceptation, it means the cutting of a soft, membranous, or aponeurotic part, which interferes with the exercise of any organ whatever; thus, in paraphimosis, débridement of the prepuce is practised to put an end to the inflammation of the glans: in strangulated hernia, débridement of the abdominal ring is had recourse to, to remove the stricture of the intestine, &c.

DEC'AGRAMME, from δεκα, 'ten,' and γραμμα, 'a gramme.' The weight of ten grammes, 154.34 grains Troy.

DECIDUA, Decidua membrana.

DECID'UA MEMBRA'NA, Decid'ua, Decid'uous Membrane, from decidere, 'to fall off,' (de and cadere.) So called on account of its being considered to be discharged from the uterus at parturition. A membrane, formerly defined to be the outermost membrane of the fœtus in utero; and still so defined by some—as by Dr. Lee. Chaussier calls it Epicho'rion: by others, it has been called Membra'na cadu'ca Hunteri, M. flocculeu'-ta seu cellulo'sa seu sinuo'sa seu commu'nis seu præexis'tens, Decidua externa seu spongio'sa, Tu'-nica exterior ovi seu cadu'ca seu crassa, Mem-bra'na cribro'sa seu ovi mater'na seu muco'sa seu u'teri intern'a evolu'ta, Epio'nē, Placen'ta uteri succenturia'tus, Subplacen'ta, Nidamen'tum, An-his'tous membrane, (F.) Caduque, C. vraie, Mem-brane caduque, Épione, Périone;—prior to the time of the Hunters, called Cho'rion spongio'sum seu tomento'sum seu fungo'sum seu reticula'tum, &c., Tu'nica filamento'sa, Shaggy Chorion, Spongy Chorion, &c. Great diversity has prevailed regarding this membrane and its reflected portion. It exists before the germ arrives in the uterus—as it has been met with in tubal and ovarial pregnancies; and is occasioned by a new action, assumed by the uterine vessels at the moment of conception. Chaussier, Lobstein, Gardien, Velpeau, and others, consider it to be a sac, without apertures, completely lining the uterus, and that when the ovum descends through the tube, it pushes the decidua before it, and becomes enveloped in it, except at the part destined to form the placenta. That portion of the membrane which covers the ovum, forms the Membra'na decid'ua reflex'a, (F.) Caduque réfléchie, Membrane caduque réfléchie, according to them—the part lining the uterus being the Decidua U'teri, (F.) Caduque utérine. Towards the end of the fourth month, the decidua reflexa disappears. The very existence of a Tunica decidua reflexa has, however, been denied. This last membrane has received various names. Dr. Granville, regarding it as the external membrane of the ovum, has termed it Cortex ovi. It has also been termed Involu'crum membrana'ceum, Membra'na retiformis cho'rii seu filamento'sa seu adventit'ia seu crassa, Ovuline and Decid'ua protru'sa. To the membrane which, according to Bojanus and others, is situate between the placenta and the uterus, and which he considers to be produced at a later period than the decidua vera, he gave the name membra'na decid'ua sero'tina.

Histological researches seem to show, that the decidua is an altered condition of the lining membrane of the uterus, with a whitish secretion filling the uterine tubular glands. The decidua reflexa is probably formed by the agency of nucleated cells from the plastic materials thrown out from the decidua uteri; in the same manner as the chorion is formed in the Fallopian Tube from plastic materials thrown out from its lining membrane. That the decidua reflexa is not a mere inverted portion of the decidua uteri is shown by the fact, that the texture of the two is by no means identical.

DECIDUA PROTRUSA, Decidua reflexa.

DECIDUOUS MEMBRANE, Decidua (membrana).

DEC'IGRAMME, Decigram'ma, from decimus, 'the tenth part,' and γραμμα, 'gramme.' The tenth part of the gramme in weight; equal to a little less than two grains, French; 1.543 Troy.

DECLAMA'TION, Declama'tio, from de, and clamare, clamatum, 'to cry out.' The art of depicting the sentiments by inflections of the voice, accompanied with gestures, which render the meaning of the speaker more evident, and infuse into the minds of the auditors the emotions with which he is impressed. Declamation may become the cause of disease: the modification, produced in the pulmonary circulation,—accompanied by the great excitement, sometimes experienced,—is the cause of many morbid affections; particularly of pneumonia, hæmoptysis, and apoplexy. In moderation, it gives a healthy excitement to the frame.

DÉCLIN, Decline.

DECLINATIO, Decline.

DECLINE, Declina'tio, Inclina'tio, Decremen'tum, Remis'sio, Parac'mē, Parac'masis, (F.) Déclin, from de, and clinare, 'to bend.' We speak, also, of the decline of life, or of the powers, (F.) Déclin de l'age, L'age de déclin, when the physical and moral faculties lose a little of their activity and energy. See Phthisis, and Tabes.

DÉCLIVE, (F.) Decli'vis, from de, 'from,' and clivus, 'acclivity.' Inclining downwards. This epithet is applied to the most depending part of a tumour or abscess.

DECOC'TION, Decoc'tio, from decoquere, 'to boil,' (de and coquere, coctum,) Epse'sis, Apoz'esis, Zesis, Hepse'sis, Aphepsis, (F.) Décoction. The operation of boiling certain ingredients in a fluid, for the purpose of extracting the parts soluble at that temperature. Decoction, likewise, means the product of this operation, to which the terms Decoctum, Zema, Aphepse'ma, Ap'ozem, Apoz'ema, Hepse'ma, Chylus and Epse'ma, (F.) Décocté, Hydrolé, Hydrolite, have been applied according to ancient custom, in order to avoid any confusion between the operation and its product;—as præparatio is used for the act of preparing; præparatum, for the thing prepared.

The fæces generally accumulate in the colon, being prevented by the annulus at the top of the rectum from descending freely into that intestine. In producing evacuations, therefore, in obstinate constipation, it is well, by means of a long tube, to throw the injection into the colon.

In Pharmacy, defecation means the separation of any substance from a liquid in which it may be suspended. See Clarification.

The act of depriving a female of her virginity. Inspection of the parts is the chief criterion of defloration having been forcibly accomplished; yet inquiry must be made, whether the injury may not have been caused by another body than the male organ. Recent defloration is infinitely more easy of detection than where some time has elapsed.

DEFLUVIUM, Aporrhœa — d. Capillorum, Alopecia—d. Pilorum, Alopecia.

A change for the worse—degradation—in the intimate composition of the solids or fluids of the body. In pathological anatomy, degeneration means the change which occurs in the structure of an organ, when transformed into a matter essentially morbid; as a cancerous, or tubercular, degeneration.

Dégénérescence is, by the French pathologists, employed synonymously with Degeneration.

DÉGORGEMENT, Disgorgement.

DÉGOUT, Disgust.

DEGRADATION, Degeneration.

DEGREE', from degré, originally from gradus, 'a step.' A title conferred by a college,—as the 'degree of Doctor of Medicine.' Galen used this expression to indicate the qualities of certain drugs. Both he and his school admitted cold, warm, moist, and dry medicines, and four different 'degrees' of each of those qualities. Thus, Apium was warm in the first degree, Agrimony in the second, Roche Alum in the third, and Garlic in the fourth. Bedegar was cold in the first, the flower of the Pomegranate in the second, the Sempervivum in the third, Opium in the fourth, &c. The French use the term degré to indicate, 1. The intensity of an affection: as a burn of the first, second, third degree, &c. 2. The particular stage of an incurable disease, as the third degree of phthisis, cancer of the stomach, &c.

The deligation of wounds formerly embraced the application of apparatus, dressings, &c., — the denomination Deliga'tor Plaga'rum being synonymous with Medicus Vulnera'rius, and in derivation, with the Wundarzt, 'wound physician' or surgeon, of the Germans. Deligation is hardly ever used now as an English word. In France, it is applied to the regular and methodical application of bandages, and to the ligature of arteries.

DELIGATURA, Deligation.

DELIQUES'CENT, Deliques'cens, from deliquescere, (de and liquescere,) 'to melt,' 'to dissolve.' Any salt which becomes liquid by attracting moisture from the air. The deliquescent salts require to be kept in bottles, well stopped. Chloride of lime, acetate of potassa, and carbonate of potassa, are examples of such salts. The ancient chemists expressed the condition of a body, which had become liquid in this manner, by the word Deliquium.

The French use the term Fièvre pernicieuse délirante for a febrile intermittent, in which delirium is the predominant symptom.

DELIR'IUM, from de, 'from,' and lira, 'a ridge between two furrows' [?]: more probably from de, and λῆρημα, 'a silly saying or action.' Parae'opē, Phreni'tis, Phledoni'a, Desipien'tia, Aphros'ynē, Paralere'ma, Paralere'sis, Paralog''ia, Phanta'sia, Paraphros'ynē, Emo'tio, Leros, Paranœ'a, Alloph'asis, Delira'tio, Delirament'um, (Sc.) Ravery, Roving, (F.) Délire, Égarement d'esprit, &c., Transport, Idéosynchysie. Straying from the rules of reason; wandering of the mind. Hippocrates used the word μανια, mania, for delirium sine febre, and the Greek words given above for delirium cum febre. In different authors, also, we find the words, Paraph'ora, Paraph'rotes, Paraphrene'sis, Paraphren'ia, Phrene'sis, Phreneti'asis, &c., for different kinds of delirium. Delirium is usually symptomatic.

A state of delirium and agitation, peculiar to those addicted to spirituous liquors, with great sleeplessness. It is preceded by indisposition, lassitude, watchfulness, headach, and anorexia; the delirium and tremors, Tremor pototo'rum, most commonly recurring in paroxysms. It is caused by the habitual and intemperate use of ardent spirits or of opium or tobacco; or rather by abandoning them after prolonged use. The treatment is various. Many have regarded stimulants, with large doses of opium to induce rest, to be indispensable. It is certain, however, that the expectant system will often, if not generally, be successful; and, it is probable, a cure effected in this manner will be more permanent than when produced by excitants.

DELIRUS, Delirious.

DÉLITESCENCE, see Repercussion.

DELITESCENTIA, see Repercussion.

DELIV'ER, (Prov.) lay, same etymon as the next. 'To put to bed.' To disburden of a child.

DÉLIVRANCE (F.), (de, and livrer, 'to set free.') An expression, which, in common language, signifies the action of delivering, libera'tio, but in the practice of obstetrics, means the extrusion of the secundines, either spontaneously or by the efforts of art. This completion of delivery — partus secunda'rius, secundina'rum expul'sio seu extrac'tio, is produced by the same laws as the expulsion of the fœtus. Sometimes, the after-birth follows the child immediately; at others, it is retained; and requires manual interference to remove it. The following are the chief cases in which this becomes necessary. 1. Intimate adhesion between the placenta and paries of the uterus. 2. Spasmodic contraction of the orifice of the uterus. 3. Hour-glass contraction. 4. Torpor or hemorrhage after the expulsion of the child, and, — 5. Insertion of the placenta at the orifice of the uterus.

L. and E.) have a disagreeable smell; a nauseous, bitterish, hot taste; and are cathartic, emetic, and vermifuge: owing, however, to the violence of their operation, they are seldom given internally, and are chiefly used in powder, mixed with hair powder, to destroy lice. The active principle of this plant has been separated, and received the name Delphin'ia, (F.) Delphine, Delphinine. It is extremely acrid, and has been recently used, like veratria, in tic douloureux, paralysis and rheumatism. It is used in the form of ointment, or in solution in alcohol, (gr. x to xxx, or more, to ℥j,) applied externally.

DEL'TOID, Deltoï'des, Delto'des, Deltoïdeus, Deltiform'is, (F.) Deltoïde, from the Greek capital letter Δ, δελτα, and εἶδος, 'resemblance.' Sous-acromio-clavi-huméral of Dumas; Sus-acromio-huméral of Chaussier. A triangular muscle forming the fleshy part of the shoulder, and covering the shoulder-joint. It extends from the outer third of the clavicle, from the acromion and spine of the scapula, to near the middle and outer part of the os humeri, where it is inserted by means of a strong tendon. This muscle raises the arm directly upwards, when the shoulder is fixed, and carries it anteriorly or posteriorly, according to the direction of the fibres, which are thrown into action. If the arm be rendered immovable, the deltoid acts inversely and depresses the shoulder.

Physicians, however, have applied it to those cases of unsound mind which are characterized by a total loss of the faculty of thought, or by such an imbecility of intellect that the ideas are extremely incoherent, there being at the same time a total loss of the power of reasoning. Mania and melancholy are apt to end in this, if possible, more deplorable state. Dotage is the Dementia of the aged—Mo'ria demens lere'ma, Lere'ma, Lere'sis, Lerus, Delira'tio Senum, Amen'tia Seni'lis, Pueril'itas, Delir'ium Seni'lë, Anil'itas, Senile Insan'ity, Senile Dementia, Insanity of the aged, (Sc.) Doittrie,—a form of moral insanity, in which the whole moral character of the individual is changed.

Demulcents may act directly on the parts with which they come in contact; but in other cases, as in catarrh, their effect is produced by contiguous sympathy; the top of the larynx being soothed by them first, and indirectly the inflamed portion of the air-passages. In diseases of the urinary organs, they have no advantage over simple diluents.—See Diluents and Emollients. The following are demulcents;—Acaciæ Gummi; Althææ Folia et Radix; Amygdalæ; Amylum; Avenæ Farina; Cera; Cetaceum; Cydoniæ Semina; Fucus Crispus; Glycyrrhiza; Hordeum; Lichen; Linum; Olivæ Oleum; Sassafras Medulla; Sesamum; Sevum; Tragacantha, and Ulmus.

To these symptoms succeeded burning heat and redness of the skin, pains in the muscles of the limbs or in the forehead, with vomiting or nausea. The fever continued for one, two or three days, and usually terminated by copious perspiration. In different places, it put on different appearances; but seems in all to have been a singular variety of rheumatic fever. The usual antiphlogistic treatment was adopted, and successfully.

A slender cord, situate between the anterior and posterior fasciculi of the spinal nerves, and between the tunica arachnoidea and pia mater. It is attached to the dura mater, where that membrane issues from the cranium, and accompanies the spinal marrow to its inferior extremity. It sends off, from its outer edge, about twenty slender processes, in the form of denticuli, each of which passes outwards and connects itself with the dura mater in the intervals between the anterior and posterior roots of the nerves.

DENTITIO, Dentition—d. Difficilis, Dysodontiasis.

DENTIT''ION, Teething, Dentit''io, Denti'tis, Odontophy'ia, Odonti'asis, Odonto'sis, from dentire, (dens, dentis, 'a tooth,') 'to breed teeth.' The exit of the teeth from the alveoli and gums; or rather the phenomena which characterize the different periods of their existence. The germs of the first teeth, dentes lac'tei or milk teeth, (F.) dens de lait, are visible in the fœtus about the end of the second month; and they begin to be ossified from the end of the third to that of the sixth month. At birth, the corona of the incisors is formed, but that of the canine is not completed; and the tubercles of the molares are not yet all united. Gradually the fang becomes developed; and at about six or eight months begins what is commonly called, the first dentit''ion, Odon'tia dentitio'nis lactan'tium. The two middle incisors of the lower jaw commonly appear first; and, some time afterwards, those of the upper jaw; afterwards, the two lateral incisors of the lower jaw; and then those of the upper, followed by the four anterior molares; the canine, or eye-teeth, at first, those of the lower, and, afterwards, those of the upper jaw, next appear; and, subsequently and successively, the first 4 molares — 2 above and 2 below, 1 on each side. The whole number of the primary, temporary, deciduous, shedding or milk-teeth, (dentes tempora'rii,) (F.) Dents de lait, is now 20.

The eruption of the milk teeth takes place, approximately, in the following order:

Central incisors	6th to 8th month.
Lateral incisors	7th to 10th month.
First molar	12th to 14th month.
Canines	15th to 20th month.
Second molar	20th to 30th month.

The second dentition or shedding of the teeth odon'tia dentitio'nis pueri'lis, Dedentit''ion, begins about the age of 6 or 7. The germs or membranous follicles of these second teeth — to the number of 32 — as well as the rudiments of the teeth themselves, are visible, even in the fœtus, with the exception of those of the small molares, which do not appear till after birth. They are contained in alveoli of the same shape as those of the first dentition. Their ossification commences at from 3 to 6 months after birth, in the incisors and first molares; at eight or nine months, in the canine; about three years, in the molares; 3½ in the second great molares, and about 10 years in the last. As the alveolus of a new tooth becomes gradually augmented, the septum between it and that of the corresponding milk tooth is absorbed, and disappears. The root of the milk tooth is likewise absorbed; its corona becomes loose and falls out, and all the first teeth are gradually replaced by the permanent teeth, Den'tes serot'ini. This second dentition becomes necessary in consequence of the increased size of the jaws. The new teeth have neither the same direction nor the same shape as the old; and they are more numerous, amounting till the age of 25, (sooner or later,) to 28. About this period, a small molaris appears at the extremity of each jaw, which is called Dens sapien'tiæ or wisdom tooth, wit tooth, Dens serot'inus, Dens sophroret'icus, D. sophronis'ta, D. sophronis'ter, (F.) Arrière dent, Dent de sagesse, making the whole number of permanent teeth 32.

The eruption of the permanent teeth is remarkable for its general regularity; so that it constitutes an important means for ascertaining the age of the individual during the early period of life.

First molars	7th year.
Central incisors	8th year.
Lateral incisors	9th year.
First bicuspids	10th year.
Second bicuspids	11th year.
Canines	12th year.
Second molars	13th year.

The teeth of the lower jaw precede by a few weeks those of the upper.

During the period of dentition, that is, of the first dentition, the infant is especially liable to disease;—the irritation, produced by the pressure of the tooth on the superincumbent gum, sometimes occasioning pyrexia, convulsions, diarrhœa, &c., which symptoms are often strikingly relieved by a free division of the distended gum. This disordered condition is called Teething, Odon'tia dentitio'nis, Odonti'asis, Odontal'gia dentitio'nis, Odaxis'mus.

It is particularly applied to the bones, when deprived of their periosteum, and to the teeth when they lose their enamel or dental substance, or when the gums recede from them, and their sockets are destroyed.

Depilatories are usually caustic applications, in which quicklime or some other alkaline substance, sulphuret of iron, &c., enter.

DEPILATORY, COLLEY'S, seems to consist of quicklime and a portion of sulphuret of potassa.

Delcroix's depilatory, and Pleuck's depilatory, have a similar composition. They all, probably, contain arsenic, in the form of orpiment. The following formula has been given for that of Colley: quicklime, 30 parts; soap lees, 125 parts; sulphur, 4 parts; nitre, 4 parts; orpiment, 12 parts. Another depilatory by F. Boudet is formed of sulphuret of sodium, 3 parts; quicklime, in powder, 10; starch, 10; mix. Rub a little of this powder with water; apply it to the part, and remove the hair in a minute or two with a wooden knife. Dorvault recommends the Depilatory of Martins, which is a sulphuretted sulphuret of calcium; made by passing sulphohydric acid into quicklime to saturation. A little of this is applied to the part, and in eight or ten minutes it becomes solid. It must then be washed off with cold or hot water, when the skin will be found denuded. Another, given by Redwood, is a strong solution of the sulphuret of barium, made into a paste with starch powder. It is used like the one advised by Boudet. Those that do not contain arsenic are, of course, safer.

A pitch plaster, Pitch-cap, is sometimes used as a depilatory. It of course pulls the hair out by the roots.

A disease, characterized by great augmentation and often manifest alteration in the secretion of urine; with excessive thirst, and progressive emaciation. Cullen has described two species: — Diabetes insip'idus and D. Melli'tus; the former, (F.) Diabète faux ou insipide, Diabète, being, simply, a superabundant discharge of limpid urine, of its usual, urinary taste: the latter, D. Melli'tus, called, also, Paru'ria Melli'ta, Diabetes An'glicus seu verus, Melitu'ria, Melithyperu'ria, Glucosu'ria, Glycyrrhœ'a urino'sa, Uroze'mia melli'ta, Saccharorrhœ'a urino'sa, Phthisu'ria, Uro-phthi'sis, Tabes diuret'ica seu diabe'tica, Dyspep'sia saccharig''ena, Apoceno'sis Diabetes Melli'tus, Sac'charine diabetes, (F.) Diabète sucré, Hyperurorrhée saccharine, Phthisurie sucrée, — falls under the definition given above. The quantity of urine, discharged in the 24 hours, is sometimes excessive, amounting to 30 pints and upwards; each pint containing sometimes 2½ oz. saccharine matter. This replaces the urea, which is not found in quantity in the urine of those labouring under diabetes. Where the disease is situate is not clear. The whole system of nutrition, however, seems to be morbidly implicated. A part of the urine must be formed at the expense of the system, as the egesta frequently far exceed the solid and liquid ingesta. On dissection, no morbid appearance is met with, sufficient to enable us to fix on the seat of this distressing affection.

All the remedies that have been tried have usually been found insufficient in D. Mellitus.

D. insip'idus, Hyperure'sis aquo'sa, Hydru'ria, Hydrure'sis, Paru'ria incon'tinens aquo'sa, Diabe'tes spu'rius, Urorrhœ'a, Ureal Diabetes, (F.) Polyurie, Hyperurorrhée, Diabète insipide, Faux diabète, which occurs in hysterical habits, and has, hence, been called D. hyster'icus, is of comparatively trifling moment. Exclusive diet, and attention to the state of the cutaneous transpiration, which have sometimes produced good effects in D. Mellitus, have most commonly failed.

DIAPHRAGMAT'IC HER'NIA, Phrenic Hernia, Diaphragmatocœ'lē. The abdominal viscera are occasionally protruded through the diaphragm, either through some of the natural apertures in the muscle, or through deficiencies, or wounds, or lacerations in it.

DIAPHRAGMAT'IC or PHRENIC NERVES, Internal respiratory of Sir Charles Bell, are two in number; one on the left side, the other on the right. They arise from the second and third nerves of the cervical plexus, about the middle of the neck, and receive two or three filaments from the brachial plexus, after which they descend into the chest at the sides of the pericardium, and are distributed on the diaphragm.

DIAPHRAGMAT'IC PLEX'USES are two in number; one right, and the other left. They arise from the upper part of the solar plexus, by a small number of branches, which are distributed to the diaphragm, following exactly the branches of the inferior diaphragmatic arteries.

DIAPHRAGMAT'IC RING, (F.) Anneau diaphragmatique of Chaussier, is a name given to the irregularly quadrilateral aperture by which the vena cava inferior passes through the diaphragm.

The essential symptoms of diaphragmitis are:—painful constriction around the præcordia, with small, quick, laborious breathing. It is a rare disease.

DIAPHRATTON HYMEN, Mediastinum—d. Membrana, Mediastinum.

DIA'PIA. Some lexicographers use this word synonymously with DIAPYESIS or SUPPURATION, others have employed it in opposition to MYOPIA.

It is commonly caused by errors in regimen, the use of food noxious by its quality or quantity, &c., constituting the Diarrhœ'a stercora'ria. D. Crapulo'sa of writers. It may be acute or chronic. Many varieties have been made by some nosologists—e. g. mucous,—Diarrhœ'a muco'sa, Blennocheˊsia, Blennocheˊzia, Mycodiarrhœ'a; bilious,—Ileo-cholo'sis, Diarrhœ'a bilio'sa; serous,—Hydrocheˊzia, Hydrodiarrhœ'a, Orrhocheˊzia; dependent upon the matters evacuated. Diarrhœa requires different treatment, according to its nature. If caused, as it often is, by improper matters in the intestinal canal, these must be evacuated; and the astringent plan of treatment must not be adopted, unless the discharges seem kept up by irritability of the intestines, or unless they are colliquative. The indiscriminate use of astringents is to be deprecated.

A very fatal diarrhœa prevails amongst the native inhabitants of India, to which Mr. Tytler has given the name Diarrhœ'a hec'tica, because, like hectic fever, it seems to obtain habitual possession of the constitution, to operate upon it with scarcely any perceptible intermission, and, in general, to defy the most powerful remedies.

The almost inappreciable time, which elapses between the diastole and systole has been called perisys'tolē, and that which succeeds to the diastole, peridiastole. When we speak of the contraction or systole of the heart, as well as of its diastole or dilatation, we mean that of the ventricles. This dilatation is active.

DIES, He'mera, A day, (F.) Jour. The day is, properly, the period during which the solar light illumines our horizon: but commonly, also, we designate by the word day the period of 24 hours or Nycthe'meron, which is frequently divided into four parts—morning, midday, evening, and midnight. In antiquity, great importance was attached to the observation of days in disease. The medical day is usually reckoned at 24 hours,—universally, in estimating the duration of a disease. In parts of the United States, it comprises only the time when the sun is above the horizon, as regards the administration of medicine, so that if a medicine be ordered to be taken four times a day, it is understood to mean during the 12 hours of day.

At the present day, it signifies a particular kind of food, and, at times, a privation of food and drink; — abstinence. To put any one upon diet, (F.) mettre quelqu'un à la diète, means to deprive him of his usual nourishment: — milk diet means a diet of milk, &c. See Aliment, Dietetics, Hygiene, and Regimen.

Every well regulated hospital has certain dietetic regulations. The following Table of Dietary shows the particular regimen that has been selected for the sick, in certain hospitals.

The Diet Scale of the British Navy allows from 31 to 35½ ounces of dry nutritious matter daily; of which 26 ounces are vegetable, and the rest animal — 9 ounces of salt meat, or 4½ ounces of fresh.

That of the Navy of the United States is as follows:—Three days in the week—Pork, 16 oz.; beans or peas, 7 oz.; biscuit, 14 oz.; pickles or cranberries, 1 oz.; sugar, 2 oz.; tea, ¼ oz.;—40¼ oz. Two days in the week—Beef, 16 oz.; flour, 8 oz.; fruit, dried, 4 oz.; biscuit, 14 oz.; tea and sugar, 2¼ oz.; pickles or cranberries, 1 oz.;—45¼ oz. Two days in the week—Beef, 16 oz.; rice, 8 oz.; butter, 2 oz.; cheese, 2 oz.; biscuit, 14 oz.; tea and sugar, 2¼ oz.; pickles or cranberries, 1 oz.;—45¼ oz.

In the Edinburgh workhouse the total allowance of dry food is about 17 ounces — 13 ounces vegetable, and 4 ounces animal. In the Edinburgh children's poor-house, the diet consists of milk and porridge, barley broth and bread, amounting to 13 ounces of vegetable food to 4 ounces of animal. These allowances have been found ample for the maintenance of health. Perhaps the case of the smallest quantity of food on which life was vigorously supported was that of Cornaro,—not more than 12 ounces a day, chiefly of vegetable matter, for a period of 58 years.

DIETARY, TABLE OF, see Diet Scale.

DIÈTE, Diet.

DIETETICS, Diætet'icē, Diætet'ica, Medici'na Diætet'ica; same etymon. (F.) Diététique. A branch of medicine, comprising the rules to be followed for preventing, relieving, or curing diseases by diet. Dietetics is diet administered according to principle. It is an important part of Hygiene. A well regulated system of diet has great power in checking disease, and likewise in preventing it. A proper knowledge of dietetics is, indeed, as important as that of the Materia Medica, strictly so called.

Dietetics has been used, also, synonymously with Hygiene.

DIÉTÉTIQUE, Dietetics.

DIETETISTS, Diætetis'tæ, (F.) Diététistes. Physicians who apply only the rules of dietetics to the treatment of disease.

DIEU-LE-FILT, MINERAL WATERS OF. The waters of Dieu-le-filt, in France, are chalybeate, and much sought after.

DIFFERENTIATION, Development.

DIFFICULTAS INTESTINORUM, Dysentery.

DIFFLATIO, Perspiration.

DIFFORMITÉ, Deformation.

DIFFU'SIBLE, (stimulants) from diffundere, (dis, and fundere, fusum, 'to pour,') 'to pour apart or abroad.' Those stimulating medicines are so called, which augment the action of the vascular and nervous systems in an acute but transitory manner.

DIGAS'TRICUS, from δις, 'twice,' and γαστηρ, 'a belly:' Biven'ter, B. Maxill'æ, Dep'rimens Maxil'læ Biven'ter, Bigas'ter, (F.) Mastoïdohyogénien, Mastoïdo-génien — (Ch.), Digastrique, Abaisseur de la machoire inférieure. The name Digastricus was formerly given to several muscles. It is now restricted to one of the muscles of the superior hyoid region. The digastricus is thick and fleshy at its extremities, thin and tendinous at its middle. It is attached to the mastoid groove of the temporal bone, and to a fossette at the side of the symphysis menti. Its tendon passes through an aponeurotic ring, which is attached to the os hyoides.

The use of the digastricus is to depress the lower jaw, or to raise the os hyoides, and to carry it forwards or backwards, as in deglutition.

The strong double-bellied muscle, which forms the gizzard of birds, is also called Digastricus.

DIGASTRICUS CRANII, Occipito-frontalis.

DIGASTRIQUE, Digastricus.

DIGENY, see Generation.

DIGERENTIA, Digestives.

DIGES'TIBLE, Concoc'tile hat'ilis. Capable of being digested. All food is not equally digestible, and some of the most important is the least so:—the fat of meat, for example. Certain substances, again, are entirely rebellious. The following table exhibits the time required for the stomachal digestion of different alimentary substances, in a well-known case, which fell under the care of Dr. Beaumont. The table is extracted from the Author's Human Health, Philadelphia, 1844. The most digestible substances are taken as the standard, which has been arbitrarily fixed at 1000; and accordingly, aponeurosis, the first article in the table, requiring 3 hours, whilst pigs' feet soused, rice, &c., require but one, its digestibility, compared with that of these aliments, is placed as 333 to 1000; and so of the others. It need scarcely be said, that all these tabular results apply, in strictness, to the individual concerned only; yet they afford useful comparative views, which with exceptions depending upon individual peculiarities, may be regarded as approximations applicable to mankind in general.

Aliments.	Form of preparation.	Time required for stomachal digestion.	Ratio of digestibility compared with the most digestible articles in the table.*	Aliments.	Form of preparation.	Time required for stomachal digestion	Ratio of digestibility compared with the most digestible articles in the table.

* Pigs' feet soused, rice, and tripe soused, being the most digestible articles in the table, are estimated at 1000.

† In the case of oils, and other substances of similar nature, which undergo little digestion in the stomach, the time merely indicates the period that elapses before they are sent into the duodenum.

DIGESTIFS, Digestives.

DIGESTIO, Digestion — d. Depravata, Dyspepsia — d. Difficilis, Dyspepsia — d. Læsa, Dyspepsia.

DIGES'TION, Digest'io, from digere, 'to dissolve;' Coctio, C. Cibo'rum, Pep'sis, Diges'tive Proc''ess. Digestion is a function, by means of which alimentary substances, when introduced into the digestive canal, undergo different alterations. The object of this is to convert them into two parts; the one, a reparatory juice, destined to renew the perpetual waste occurring in the economy: the other, deprived of its nutritious properties, to be rejected from the body. This function is composed of a series of organic actions, differing according to the particular organization of the animal. In man they are eight in number, viz: 1. Prehension of food. 2. Mastication. 3. Insalivation. 4. Deglutition. 5. Action of the stomach. 6. Action of the small intestine. 7. Action of the large intestine. 8. Expulsion of the fæces.

Digestion is also a pharmaceutical operation, which consists in treating certain solid substances with water, alcohol, or other menstruum, at a slightly elevated temperature, — in a sand-bath, for example, or by leaving them exposed for some time to the sun.

DIGESTIVE, see Digestives — d. Principle, Pepsin — d. Process, Digestion.

Digestive Texture. The particular organic condition of substances which affects their digestibility.

Digestive Tube, Canal, alimentary.

Diges'tives, Digesti'va, Digeren'tia; same etymon as Digestion. (F.) Digestifs. A term given, by surgeons, to substances, which, when applied to a wound or ulcer, promote suppuration; as the ceratum resinæ, warm cataplasms, fomentations, &c. Such substances are vulgarly termed drawing.

DIG''ITAL, Digita'lis; from digitus, 'a finger:' having the shape of a finger; digitated. Belonging to the fingers.

The Appen'dix vermifor'mis cæci is sometimes called Dig''ital Appen'dix.

Digital Arteries, Veins, and Nerves, are those distributed to the fingers.

Digital Impressions, see Impressions Digital, are the slight depressions observable on the inner surface of the bones of the cranium, which correspond to the cerebral convolutions.

DIGITALE PETITE, Gratiola officinalis.

DIGITA'LE. Same etymon as Digital. (F.) Doigtier. A finger stall. The term Doigtier d'Aedrubali has been given to a small iron instrument used for measuring the dimensions of the pelvis. Placed at the end of the index finger, it adds to its length and enables it to reach the promontory of the sacrum.

DIGITALINE, see Digitalis.

DIGITA'LIS, from digitus, 'a finger,' because its flower represents a finger; Digita'lis purpu'rea, Bac'charis, Bacchar, Baccar, [?] Fox-glove, (Sc.) Deadmen's bells, (Prov.) Flapdock. Ord. Scrophularineæ. Sex. Syst. Didynamia Angiospermia. (F.) Digitale, Gants de notre dame, Doigtier. The leaves of this plant, which are indigenous in Great Britain, are powerfully sedative, diminishing the velocity of the pulse, diuretic, and sorbefacient. In over-doses, Digitalis causes vomiting, purging, dimness of sight, vertigo, delirium, hiccough, convulsions, and death: —all the symptoms, in short, which characterize the acro-narcotic class of poisons. Its active principle has been called Dig''italine. It is a hundred-fold stronger than the most active preparation of digitalis.

Digitalis has been administered in inflammatory diseases, phthisis, active hemorrhage, dropsy, &c.; but although it is a powerful remedy, it has not been as much employed as it probably would have been in particular cases, owing to the over-strained eulogiums, which many have passed upon it in almost all diseases. The average dose is one grain, in the form of pill, which may be repeated every six or eight hours.

Digitalis Minima, Gratiola officinalis.

DIGITARIA DACTYLON, Cynodon dactylon.

DIGITA'TION, Digita'tio, Produc'tio denta'ta, Inser'tio denticula'ta, I. digita'ta, (F.) Dentature, Dentelure. A division into processes having the form of fingers. Several muscles, as the serati, exhibit digitations, similar to those which the fingers form, when held separate.

Caloric has the property of dilating all bodies. In Surgery, it means the accidental or preternatural augmentation of a canal or opening; as in aneurisms, varices, &c., or the process of enlarging any aperture or canal. When used so as to obtain a view of parts, as by the speculum, it is termed Dioptris'mus.

DILA'TING AGENTS, Dilatan'tia, (F.) Dilatants. Certain substances used in surgery, either to keep parts separate which have a tendency to unite — as after opening an abscess, to prevent the edges of the incision from uniting; or to increase and dilate openings of canals, either when natural, or formed accidentally or artificially. These agents differ from each other: the chief are — prepared sponge tents, gentian root, bougies, sounds, dried peas for issues, &c.

DILA'TOR, Dilatato'rium, Diastoleus, (F.) Dilatateur ou Dilatatoire. A muscle, whose office it is to dilate certain parts; such as the inspiratory muscles, which dilate the chest.

DILATOR, Dilatato'rium, (F.) Dilatateur. An instrument, used for dilating a wound, excretory canal, or other natural or artificial opening. When employed to obtain an inspection of internal parts, it is termed Spec'ulum, Diop'tra, or Diop'tron. There are several instruments of this kind, each taking its name from the part to which it is applied; as Speculum Oris, S. Nasi, S. Uteri, &c.

DILATOR, ARNOTT'S. A modification of the old dilators for strictures of the urethra. It consists of a tube of oiled silk, lined with the thin gut of some small animal to make it air-tight, and fixed on the extremity of a small canula. by which it is distended with air or water, from a bag or syringe at the outer end, whilst a stop-cock or valve serves to keep the air or water in, when received. As soon as the bag is passed within the stricture or strictures, as much air is to be injected into it as the patient can easily bear. The instrument is not much used.

DILATATORES ALARUM NASI, Compressor Naris.

DILATRIS TINCTORIA, Lachnanthes tinctoria.

DILLY, Anthemis cotula.

DILUEN'TIA, from diluo, (dis, and luere,) 'I wash away.' (F.) Délayants. Medicines which have been conceived proper for augmenting the fluidity of the blood and other animal liquids. All aqueous drinks are diluents. They are administered, with great advantage, in various diseases. In fever, water, which is the most familiar diluent, may be freely allowed; the only precaution being to give it hot in the cold stage, cold in the hot, and tepid in the sweating. In diseases, where it is considered necessary to abstract blood largely, diluents should not be given too freely. The abstraction of blood occasions activity of absorption, and the mass is speedily restored. It is also obvious, that in cases of inflammation of the mammæ, in nurses, diluents should not be freely allowed, as they increase the secretion of milk, and add to the irritation. When demulcents are exhibited in cases of urinary disease, they act simply as diluents: their mucilaginous portion is digested in the stomach and small intestine, — the watery portion alone being separated by the kidney.

DILWEED, Anthemis cotula.

Sometimes more than two are seen; but still the disease is termed Diplo'pia and Suffu'sio Mult'iplicans. This affection arises from some derangement in the visual axes, in consequence of which, the images are not impressed on corresponding parts of the retina of each eye. At times, the diplopia affects one eye, or each eye when used alone, owing to some irregularity in the curvature, density, or position of the dioptric media. It is then called Unioc'ular Diplopia.

The Pharmacopœia too, is published under the authority of, and by the members of a college or association; whilst a Dispensatory contains the whole of the Pharmacopœia or Pharmacopœias, with additions by the author, under whose authority alone it usually appears. The Pharmacopœia, in other words, is officinal; the Dispensatory, generally, private. Formerly, the words were used indiscriminately. See Formulary, and Pharmacopœia.

The ancients distinguished distillation per latus, per ascen'sum, and per descen'sum, according to the direction which the volatilized matters were made to take. In distillation per latus, the apparatus is so arranged, that the vapour passes horizontally through a succession of spaces before reaching the receiver. Distillation per ascensum is the ordinary method by the still. In distillation per descensum, the fire is applied above and around the top of the apparatus; and it is so arranged that the vapour must pass downwards. When dry organic matter is placed in an apparatus for distillation, and heat is applied until all volatile matter is driven out, the process is called dry or destructive distillation.

These consist, chiefly, 1. In testing them with water, for the purpose of seeing whether the lungs are specifically heavier or lighter than that fluid. This is called Docima'sia Pulmo'num hydrostat'ica or the Hydrostatic Test. If lighter, it would be some evidence that the fœtus had respired: 2. DOS, Dorsum.

DOSAGE, Posology.

DOSE, Dosis, Præ'bium. The quantity of any substance, which ought to form part of a compound medicine, or ought to be exhibited singly, to produce a desired effect. Many circumstances influence the doses of medicine. Women require smaller doses, as a general principle, than men. Habit has a great effect, as well as climate, age, and idiosyncrasy: all these, and other circumstances, must be taken into account; and every general rule on the subject will be found to have numerous exceptions. Some of the mechanical physicians laid it down as a rule, that the doses of medicines must always be as the square of the constitution!—A matter not easy of calculation.

The following Tables will exhibit an approximation to the proper doses (according to age) of most substances.

TABLE OF DOSES ACCORDING TO AGE.

Age 24	Let the full dose be	1	1 drachm.
18	will require	2-3ds.	2 scruples.
14	- - - -	half.	½ drachm.
7	- - - -	1-3d.	1 scruple.
4	- - - -	1-4th.	15 grains.
3	- - - -	1-6th.	10 grains.
2	- - - -	1-8th.	8 grains.
1	- - - -	1-12th.	5 grains.

The table of doses, according to age, recommended by Dr. Thomas Young, differs in some respects from the above. Either affords a sufficient general approximation. His rule is, that

For children, under twelve years of age, the doses of most medicines must be diminished in the proportion of the age to the age increased by twelve:

Thus, at two years, to 1-7th; i. e., $1\text{-}7\text{th} = \frac{2}{2+12}$

At twenty-one the full dose is given.

DOSES, BROKEN. When an agent is given in small portions it is said to be in broken doses,—refractis dosibus.

DOUCHE (F.). In Italian, doccia: modern Latin, ducia; Cataclys'mus, Douse. This term is applied to a column of fluid, of a determinate nature and temperature, let fall upon the body. Pumping is a variety of the Douche. In using this kind of bath, the fluid is directed upon the part on which we are desirous of acting. The douches descendantes are those in which the fluid falls from a height,—the douches ascendantes, those administered in diseases of the uterus, —the douches horizontales, where the fluid is impelled horizontally, &c. They may be cold or warm, according to circumstances. The apparatus consists of a reservoir of water having a pipe or plug, by means of which the water can be directed as the practitioner may desire. The Douche communicates a considerable and peculiar shock to the nervous system; and is one of the most successful means for taming the furious maniac. It is, also, useful in chronic rheumatism, stiff joints, &c.

Douches of air are, also, occasionally used, as in cases of obstruction of the Eustachian tube by mucus. They are sent from an air-press — of which Deleau and Kramer have invented one each—through a catheter introduced through the nose into the tube.

Aroideæ or Araceæ. Sex. Syst. Tetrandria Monogynia. This indigenous plant, as some of its names import, is extremely fetid. S.,) ten to twenty grains. It resembles asafœtida and other fetid gums in its properties; in other words, belongs to the class of reputed antispasmodics.

A genus of worms, frequently met with in Indian and African climes. They are characterized by a filiform body, and are smooth and nearly of equal thickness throughout. The Guinea worm, when small, insinuates itself through the cutaneous pores, and penetrates into the areolar membrane and between the muscles; especially between those of the lower limbs, where it occasions a tumour like a boil, which subsequently suppurates, and the head of the worm appears and emerges gradually. The head must then be seized, and the worm be cautiously rolled round a small cylinder of linen or other substance. Care must be taken not to break it, as great pain and obstinate suppuration might be the consequence.

Considerable obscurity rests on this subject. Some even deny that the cases of Dracunculus, on record, are really those of worms.

DRAINING, Desicca'tio, (F.) Dessèchement. The act of drawing off the water from marshes, for the purpose of destroying the unhealthy emanations which proceed from them. It is a well known fact, that from marshes arise certain emanations or miasmata, with the nature of which we are, however, totally unacquainted, but which are the fertile source of intermittents and other diseases. Draining the soil and converting it into arable land changes its character, and the malaria ceases to be given off. It has happened, however, that although in some such situations intermittents have been got rid of, consumptions have taken their place.

Some drinks are exciting and tonic, as the different varieties of beer, wine, and spirits, which we use at table. In a therapeutical point of view, drinks are used to appease the thirst which prevails in febrile affections, or to act as diluents in those and other cases.

The ordinary drinks, according to their chemical composition, are—1. Water, spring water, river water, well water, &c.—2. Juices and infusions of Animal and Vegetable substances, lemon juice, currant juice, whey, tea, coffee, mattee, &c. —3. Fermented Liquors, wines, ale, beer, cider, perry.—4. Spirituous Liquors, brandy, alcohol,

The duodenum is the first part of the intestinal canal, commencing at the pyloric orifice of the stomach, and terminating in the jejunum. Its length is about twelve fingers' breadth, and as it is only partially covered by the peritoneum, it is susceptible of considerable dilatation; hence its name Ventriculus succenturiatus. In the duodenum, chylification takes place after the admixture of the biliary and pancreatic fluids with the chyme.

DYNAMETER, Dynamometer.

DYNAM'IC, Dynam'ical, Dynam'icus, (F.) Dynamique. Same etymon. In Mechanics, Dynam'ics investigates the powers whereby bodies are put in motion, and the laws connected therewith. In Biology, that which relates to the vital forces, to the organism in action, Vital Dynamics. The influences of agents on the organism, which are ascribable to neither mechanical nor chemical causes, are sometimes termed dynamic. In this sense, it is a favorite term with the homœopathists, who maintain that, by certain processes, called, in the aggregate, dynamiza'tion and potenti'zing, the dynamic powers of a medicine may be set free and developed—as by shaking the bottle in which the article is contained, or by mixing an unlimited number of unmedicated globules with one that is medicated, and shaking them together. In this way, the former become potentized!

DYNAMIC DISEASES, see Organic.

DYNAMICS, VITAL, see Dynamic.

DYNAMICUS, Dynamic.

DYNAMIS, Faculty, Force.

DYNAMIZATION, see Dynamic.

DYNAMOM'ETER, Myodynamiom'eter, Myodynamom'eter, (F.) Dynamomètre, from δυναμις, 'force,' 'vital power,' and μετρον, 'measure.' An instrument, contrived by M. Regnier, for measuring the comparative muscular strength of man and animals. It consists of a spring, which, when pressed upon, causes a needle to move upon a portion of a circle, furnished with a scale of kilogrammes and one of myriagrammes. To measure the strength of the hands, the two branches of the spring are firmly grasped, and brought as near together as the force can carry them. This effort makes the needle traverse, and indicates, on the scale of kilogrammes, the strength of the experimenter's hands. A man, 25 or 30 years of age, exerts a force commonly equal to 50 kilogrammes or 100 pounds.

The strength of the loins of a man, about 30 years of age, as indicated by this instrument, is usually about 30 myriagrammes, or 265 pounds, which shows the weight he is capable of raising.

From experiments made by Peron, in his voyage, on 12 individuals of Van Diemen's Land, 17 of New Holland, 56 of the Island of Timor, 17 Frenchmen belonging to the expedition, and 14 Englishmen in the colony of New South Wales, he found their comparative strength, indicated by the dynamometer, to be as follows:

NATIVES OF	STRENGTH of the arm.		of the loins.
	Kilog.	lbs.	Myri.	lbs.
1. Van Diemen's Land.	50.6	101.2
2. New Holland.	50.8	101.6	10.2	208.08
3. Timor.	58.7	117.4	11.6	238.64
4. France.	69.2	138.4	15.2	310.08
5. England.	71.4	142.4	15.2	332.52

DYNAMOMETER OF DYNAM'ETER, MEDIC''INAL. An instrument, invented by Dr. Paris, for the purpose of showing the quantity of active matter contained in a given weight or measure of any officinal compound, with the dose of any preparation, which will be equivalent in strength to a given quantity of any other of the same class. The instrument is more ingenious than useful.

Celsi, Blennenter'ia, Morbus dissolu'tus, Sedes cruen'tæ, Lues dysenter'ica, Bloody Flux; Flux*, (F.) Dysentérie, Dysentérie, Flux dysentérique, Flux de Sang. Inflammation of the mucous membrane of the large intestine; the chief symptoms of which are:—fever, more or less inflammatory, with frequent mucous or bloody evacuations; violent tormina and tenesmus. When the evacuations do not contain blood, it has been called Dysenter'ia alba or simple Dysentery, Myco-dysenter'ia. The seat of the disease is, generally, in the colon and rectum. It occurs, particularly, during the summer and autumnal months, and in hot climates more than in cold: frequently, also, in camps and prisons, in consequence of impure air, and imperfect nourishment: and is often epidemic. Sporadic cases of dysentery are, generally, easily managed; but when the disease occurs epidemically, it often exhibits great malignancy. Generally, it yields to mild laxatives, as castor oil, combined with diaphoretic narcotics, such as the pulvis ipecacuanhæ compositus, and counter-irritants to the abdomen; but, at times, the inflammation runs on so speedily to ulceration, that, unless a new action be rapidly excited, death will be the consequence. In such cases, mercury must be rapidly introduced into the system, and narcotics may be combined with it.

The whole management in acute dysentery must, of course, be strictly antiphlogistic.

Dysmenorrhœa is very difficult of removal, and prevents conception. In the married female, if she should be able to pass one period without pain, and subsequently become pregnant, the morbid action may be broken in upon by gestation, and a perfect cure be obtained. Change of air, soon after marriage, will sometimes give occasion to this desirable result. The affection generally depends upon erethism of the interior of the uterus, called into action at each catamenial period. The violence of the pain requires the liberal use of narcotics.

The symptoms of dyspepsia are very various. Those affecting the stomach itself are:—loss of appetite; nausea; pain in the epigastrium or hypochondrium; heart-burn; sense of fulness, or weight in the stomach; acrid or fetid eructations; pyrosis, and sense of fluttering or sinking at the pit of the stomach. The sympathetic affections are of the most diversified character. Dyspepsia, being generally of a functional nature, is devoid of danger. When arising from disease of the stomach itself, it is, of course, more serious.

It is usually dependent on irregularity of living; either in the quantity or quality of the food taken: and the most successful treatment is, to put the patient on a diet easy of digestion; to combat the causes, where such are apparent; and, by proper remedies and regimen, to strengthen the system in every practicable manner. A great error exists in regarding it as always a disease of debility. It is often connected with an inflammatory or subinflammatory condition of the mucous lining of the stomach, and of course a very different plan of treatment is required in the two cases. Dyspepsia is often attended with too great a secretion of the gastric acids; but, on other occasions, they would appear to be too small in quantity, so as to constitute alkaline indigestion or neutral indigestion.

EAR, Auris, Ous, ους, Ac'oë, Saxon, eare, (Prov.) Lug. (F.) Oreille. The organ of audition. It is composed of a series of more or less irregular cavities, in which the sonorous rays are successively received and reflected, until they agitate the nerves which are destined to convey the impression to the brain. The ear is contained partly in the substance of the temporal bone; and a part projects externally, behind the joint of the lower jaw. It may be divided into three portions;—the outer or external ear, formed by the auricle and meatus auditorius; the middle ear, comprising the cavity of the tympanum and its dependencies; and the internal ear, comprehending the three semicircular canals, the cochlea and the vestibule; which, together, constitute the osseous labyrinth. Within the cavity of this labyrioth are contained membranes having nearly the shape of the vestibule and semicircular canals, but not extending into the cochlea. These membranes form the membranous labyrinth. Between the osseous and the membranous labyrinth is situate the liquor of Cotunnius, and within the membranous labyrinth is a fluid, termed, by De Blainville, vitrine auditive, from its supposed analogy to the vitreous humour of the eye. The form of the membranous vestibule is not an exact imitation of the osseous cavity, being composed of two distinct sacs, which open into each other, — the one termed the Sac'culus vestib'uli; the other Sac'culus Each sac contains in its interior a small mass of white calcareous matter resembling powdered chalk, which seems to be suspended in the fluid of the sacs by means of a number of nervous filaments proceeding from the auditory nerve. These are the otoconies and otolithes of Breschet.

The auditory nerve is distributed to the cavities of the internal ear.

ELECTRIC''ITY, Electric''itas, from ηλεκτρον, 'amber,'—the substance in which it was first noticed. Electricity is used medicinally as an excitant. It has been occasionally employed with success in paralysis, rheumatism, accidental deafness, amaurosis, amenorrhœa, &c., but it is uncertain, and not much used; and the cases are not always clear in which it could be of service. It may be communicated by means of the electric bath — Bain électrique, as it has been called; which consists in placing the patient upon an insulated stool, and connecting him with the prime conductor, of which he thus becomes a part. The fluid may be communicated by points, sparks, or by shocks, according to the required intensity.

ELEPHANTI'ASIS, Elephanti'a, Elephantias'mus, El'ephas, Laz'ari morbus seu malum, Phœnic''eus morbus, Phymato'sis Elephanti'asis, from ελεφας, ελεφαντος, 'an elephant.' Various affections have been described under this name, by adding an epithet. It is ordinarily and generically applied to a condition, in which the skin is thick, livid, rugous, tuberculate, and insensible to feeling.

ELEPHANTIASIS OF THE ANTILLES, Barba'does Leg, Gland'ular disease of Barbadoes, (F.) Jambes de Barbade, is the Elephantiasis of many writers, Bucne'mia. It is characterized by the leg being enormously tumid and misshapen; skin thickened, livid, and rugous, often scaly; scrotum, arms, or other parts sometimes participating in the affection. The Bucne'mia Trop'ica, Cochin leg, is an affection of this kind.

ELEPHANTI'ASIS ARAB'ICA, Tyri'asis, El'ephas, Elephanti'asis, E. Indica, Elephanti'a Ar'abum, Lepra Arabum (of some), Maladie glandulaire, Ladrerie, Yava Skin of the Polynesians [?]. In this the tubercles are chiefly on the face and joints. There is loss of hair, except on the scalp; voice, hoarse and nasal; and the disease is said to be contagious and hereditary. It most frequently attacks the feet; and gives the lower extremity a fancied resemblance to the leg of an elephant, whence its name. The seat of the disease seems to be in the lymphatic vessels and glands, and in the subcutaneous areolar tissue: the inflammatory condition of which is accompanied with general morbid symptoms. Medicine has little or no effect on this loathsome complaint. See Lepra.

ELEPHANTIASIS OF CAYENNE, Mal rouge de Cayenne, seems to be a variety of Lepra, characterized by red and yellow spots, occupying the forehead, ears, hands, loins, &c., afterwards extending and becoming scaly, with deformity of the parts where they are seated, particularly of the face; and ultimately producing cracks, ulcers, caries, and sometimes death.

ELEPHANTIASIS OF THE GREEKS, E. Græco'rum, is probably the same disease as Lepra.

ELEPHANTIASIS OF INDIA is characterized by red, livid, or yellowish spots, slightly prominent, to which succeed indolent tumours, formed in the areolar texture. At a more advanced period the phalanges swell, and become ulcerated; the bones of the nose carious, the lips thickened, and emaciation gradually carries off the patient. It likewise belongs to lepra.

ELEPHANTIASIS ITALICA, Pellagra.

ELEPHANTIASIS OF JAVA is likewise a variety of lepra, characterized by large white tumours on the toes and fingers, resembling scrofulous tumefactions. These tumours ulcerate, and the ulcerations spread from the extremities towards the trunk, destroying even the bones. Amputation can alone arrest its progress. The disease is often accompanied by alopecia, and by an eruption of red spots.

ELEPHAN'TINUM EMPLAS'TRUM, Ελεφαντινον. An ancient plaster, composed of 30 parts of ceruss, 45 of wax, oil lbss, water lbj.—Castelli. Oribasius and Celsus both mention a plaster of this name, but they are by no means similar in composition.

ELEVATOR, Elevato'rium, Vectis elevato'rius, Élévatoire. A name given to different surgical instruments employed for raising portions of bone which have been depressed, for raising and detaching the portion of bone separated by the crown of the trepan, and for removing stumps of teeth.

Oculi, Rectus superior oculi—e. Patientiæ, Levator scapulæ — e. Scapulæ, Levator scapulæ — e Testiculi, Cremaster — e. Urethræ, see Transversus perinæi.

ELEVATOR, COMMON. This is a mere lever, the end of which is somewhat bent and made rough, in order that it may less readily slip away from the portion of bone which is to be raised. The instrument is used, by forming a fulcrum for it, either on the hand which holds it, or upon the fingers of the other hand; or by making a fixed point for it on the edge of the opening made with the trephine.

ELEVATOR OF LOUIS differed from the last only in the circumstance of the screw-peg being united to the bridge by a kind of pivot instead of hinge, so that greater extent of motion was permitted.

Elevator of Petit consists of a lever mounted on a handle, and straight throughout its whole length, except at its very end, which is slightly curved, in order that it may be more conveniently put under the portion of bone intended to be elevated. The lever is pierced at various distances from its butt-end with several holes, intended for the reception of a movable screw-peg, fixed on the top of a kind of bridge. This part of the instrument consists of an arch, the ends of which are long, and covered with small pads, and on its centre is the screw-peg already mentioned. By means of these holes the arm of the lever can be lengthened at pleasure.

Elevator, Trip'loid, Vectis triploï'des. This was so called from its consisting of three branches, uniting above in one common trunk. The latter part was traversed by a long screw, having below a kind of hook, and above a handle for turning it. By turning the screw, the hook was drawn up, and the bone thus elevated.

The simple lever is the only one now used, owing to the want of facility and advantages in the use of the others.
